"The law is progressive and expansive, adapting itself to the new relations and interests which are constantly springing up in the progress of society. But this progress must be by analogy to what is already settled."

EXPLANATION

THE object in view in preparing Corpus Juris Secundum has been twofold: First, to provide a complete encyclopedic treatment of the whole body of the law, which means that it must be based upon all the reported cases; Second, to present each title of the law in form and content most suitable as a means of practical reference for the Bench and Bar.

Corpus Juris Secundum is therefore a complete restatement of the entire body of American Law. The clear-cut and exhaustive propositions comprising the text are supported by all the authorities from the earliest times to date. The supporting case citations, conspicuously set out in the notes, point to all decisions handed down since the publication of Corpus Juris. When the searcher may wish to consult earlier authorities, a specific reference to Corpus Juris will make available all cases back to 1658.

Each title will be preceded by a complete section analysis, greatly simplified to facilitate research. Where the scope of any section is such as to require it, a more minute analysis will be found thereunder in its appropriate place within the title (see Abatement and Revival, Section 112). The convenience of this method—an innovation in encyclopedic writing—must immediately commend itself.

A concise summary, a black-letter epitome, indicative of its scope, will precede the full treatment or statement of the law under each section. These introductory summaries, concise and free from interlineation of authorities, will prove of great convenience and value in legal research.

An index will be found in the back of each volume covering the titles contained therein, thus providing another convenient means of ready access to the text and notes.

Corpus Juris Secundum will be kept to date by means of annual cumulative pocket parts for each volume. This feature of supplementation which has proved so successful in modern digests and statutes will conveniently, and with certainty, keep each title constantly to date through current cases and new precedents.

Corpus Juris Secundum represents the combined product of the highest editorial talent and manufacturing skill. Its many excellent editorial features are fittingly accompanied by corresponding innovations and improvements in mechanical arrangement, typography, and design, which the publisher believes will commend themselves to the profession as representing a new standard in legal publications.

I. INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT

§ 1. Kinds of Carriers

Within the definition of the term carriers are either private or common carriers.

A carrier is one who undertakes the transfer of persons or property from one place to another for hire,[1] or gratuitously.[2] The authorities recognize two classes of carriers, namely, private carriers and common carriers;[3] all persons who undertake for hire, to carry the goods of another, belong to one or the other of these classes,[4] the class to which a particular carrier is to be assigned depending on the nature of the business, the character in which it holds itself out to the public, the terms of the contract, and its relations generally with the parties with whom it deals and the public.[5] While a common carrier has been defined as one that holds itself out to the public to carry persons or freight for hire, see infra §§ 3, 530, the term did not, at the common law, embrace a carrier of passengers, see infra § 530.

II. CARRIERS OF GOODS AND LIVE STOCK

A. DEFINITIONS AND GENERAL NATURE

§ 2. In General

A carrier of goods is one who undertakes to carry, or is engaged in the business of carrying, goods for hire.

A carrier of goods is one who undertakes for hire to transport the goods of another, or who is engaged in the business of carrying goods for others for hire.[6] A "mandatory" is a person who undertakes gratuitously to carry goods for another, and was known to the civil law as a carrier, and was so recognized by the common law.[7]

§ 3. Common Carrier in General

a. Common carrier defined
b. Essential characteristics

a. Common Carrier Defined

A common carrier is one who as a regular business transports personal property from place to place for persons who may employ him and pay his charges. What constitutes a common carrier is a question of law; but whether one charged as such is within the definition is a question of fact.

A common carrier of goods has been defined as one who, by virtue of his calling, and as a regular business, undertakes to transport goods from place to place, offering his services to such as may choose to employ him and pay his charges,[8] and

It is a question of law for the court to determine what constitutes a common carrier;[10] but whether one charged as a common carrier is within that definition and is carrying on its business in that capacity, is a question of fact to be determined from the evidence in each case by the triers of fact.[11]

Failure to file tariffs

While the failure of a refrigerator car company to file tariffs with the interstate commerce commission is not proof that it is not a common carrier, it is evidence tending to show that it did not regard itself as such.—U. S. ex rel Chicago, New York & Boston Refrigerator Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 288 F. 649, 53 App.D.C. 111, affirmed 44 S.Ct. 558, 265 U.S. 292, 68 L.Ed. 1024.

ty is a common carrier of goods is: (1) He must be engaged in the business of carrying goods for others as a public employment, and must hold himself out as ready to engage in the transportation of goods for persons generally as a business, and not as a casual occupation. (2) He must undertake to carry goods of the kind to which his business is confined. (3) He must undertake to carry by the methods by which his business is conducted, and over his established roads. (4) The transportation must be for hire.[12] The distinctive characteristics of a common carrier are those stated in the first test set out above, viz: That he holds himself out as ready to engage in the transportation of goods for hire as a public employment, and not as a casual occupation,[13] and that he undertakes to carry for all persons indifferently,[14] within the limits of his

Other statements of rule

(1) In order to constitute one a common carrier, the business of a common carrier must be regular and customary in its character, and not casual only, but must be conducted as a business, and must be of such a general and public nature that a person carrying it on is bound to convey goods of all persons indifferently who offer to pay for the transportation, an occasional undertaking to carry goods not being sufficient.—Presson v Vail Cooperage Co., 245 S.W 14, 155 Ark 424—Arkadelphia Milling Co. v. Smoker Merchandise Co., 139 S.W. 680, 100 Ark. 37.

(2) To constitute a person a common carrier of goods in a particular instance the carrier in question must be over a route or within a territory over or within which there has been a general undertaking by the person, a holding of himself out as undertaking to carry goods for the public generally, as a business, over that route or within that territory, which undertaking may be either express or may be implied from conduct by a series of acts by known habitual continuance in such line of business.—Ney v. Haun, 109 S.E. 438, 131 Va 557, 18 A.L.R 1310.

True test is whether the given undertaking is a part of the business engaged in by the carrier, which he has held out to the general public as his occupation, rather than the quantity or extent of the business actually transacted, or the number and character of the conveyances used in the employment.—Cushing v. Other statements of rule

(1) Test of "public carrier is" whether he holds himself out as being ready and willing for hire to carry particular classes of goods for all who may desire transportation between places between which he professes to carry.—State v. Washington Tug & Barge Co., 250 P. 49, 140 Wash 613.

(2) Test of "common carrier" of property is not whether he is carrying on public employment, nor whether he carries to fixed place, but whether he holds out, either expressly or by course of conduct, that he will carry for hire, so long as he has room, goods of all persons without preference.—State ex rel. Board of Railroad Com'rs v. Rosenstein, 252 N.W. 251, 217 Iowa 985.

(3) To constitute a common carrier there must be a dedication of property to public use of such character that the product and service are available to the public generally and indiscriminately, and that the carrier must hold himself ready to serve the public indifferently to the limit of his capacity.—Motor Freight v. Public Utilities Commission of Ohio, 165 N.E. 355, 120 Ohio St. 1.

Essential feature of "public use," distinguishing a common carrier capacity[15] and the sphere of the business required of him,[16] so that he is bound to serve all who apply, and is liable for refusal, without sufficient reason, to do so.[17]

In general, the liability of carrier does not attach to one that does not hold itself out as pursuing that business, but in the particular case, and in each particular case, acts only in consequence of a special employment.[18] The law applicable to common carriers is peculiarly rigorous, and it ought not to be extended to persons who have neither expressly assumed that character nor by their conduct and from the nature of their business justified the belief on the part of the public that they intended to assume it.[19] Whether one is a common carrier is determined by the business actually carried on[20] from a private carrier, is that it is not confined to privileged individuals, but is open to the indefinite public. —State ex rel. Anderson v. Witthaus, 102 S.W.2d 99, 340 Mo. 1004.

"Public" which a carrier must serve to constitute it a common carrier does not mean everybody all the time.—State ex rel. Anderson v. Witthaus, 102 S.W.2d 99, 340 Mo. 1004.

Real test of whether person is common carrier is whether he serves alike all of public who apply to him for carriage.—Beatrice Creamery Co. v. Fisher, 10 N.E.2d 220, 291 Ill.App. 495.

Whether a carrier is a common carrier or a private carrier depends, not on number of persons whom carrier serves, but on whether carrier's services are available to all members of public who may require them, to extent of carrier's capacity, and fact that only limited number may have occasion to use carrier's services does not make carrier a "private carrier" if public generally has right to avail itself of carrier's services, the essential feature being that carrier's services are not confined to privileged individuals but are available to indefinite public.—Phillips v. Public Service Commission, Pa.Super., 191 A. 641.

Acts evidencing nature of carrier

(1) Mere rendering of service by carrier to limited number of persons is not proof that carrier has devoted his facilities to public use, but very fact that he has limited his actual service, as well as his offering to serve, to a privileged few is some evidence that he is not a common carrier.—Phillips v. Public Service Commission, Pa.Super., 191 A. 641.

(2) Proof that carrier has transported property for more than two persons, without other circumstances, is not ordinarily sufficient to show that carrier is common carrier. —Klawansky v. Public Service Commission of Pennsylvania, 187 A. 248, 123 Pa.Super. 375.

(3) Undertaking of common carrier to carry goods for all people indifferently may be evidenced by carrier's own notice or practically by series of acts in business.—McIntyre v. Harrison, 157 S.E. 499, 172 Ga. 65.

Corpus Juris is cited in North Shore Fish & Freight Co. v. North Shore Business Men's Trucking Ass'n, 263 N.W. 98, 195 Minn. 326 in connection with a ruling that one who carries for hire in competition with common carriers is himself a common carrier subject to regulation as such, and a statement that the courts "have thrown into the discard various and varied schemes to avoid statutory requirements relating to control and regulation of public carriers."

Mere schemes or devices to avoid the duties and responsibilities of a common carrier are unavailing when true character of such acts is established.—Dairymen's Co-op. Sales Ass'n v. Public Service Commission of Pennsylvania, 177 A. 770, 318 Pa. 381, 98 A.L.R. 213.

or the obligation assumed,[21] and not by what the carrier is authorized to do,[22] or says he is doing,[23] or by any secret intention or mental reservation entertained or asserted when charged with duties and obligations which the law imposes.[24] So, one holding himself out as a common carrier does not divest himself of that status by a secret intention to reserve the right to refuse to serve certain persons,[25] or because he may on occasion refuse to perform the services for which he is equipped,[26] or by the fact that he does not advertise.[27]

One may be a common carrier although such business is not his exclusive business, and he is not continually or regularly engaged in it;[28] and it is sometimes said that one that undertakes for only a single occasion to carry goods for any person who desires to employ it for that occasion is a common carrier for that transportation.[29] On the other hand, the fact that a carrier invites all persons to employ him does not make him a common carrier, if he reserves the right to accept or reject offers within his discretion,[30] or because, by contract, he exempts himself from the usual common-law duties of a public carrier, as stated in § 113 infra.

It is not an essential characteristic of a common carrier that he operate between fixed termini, or on regular schedules[31] or at uniform or fixed charges.[32]

An individual, as well as a corporation, may be liable as a common carrier.[33]

Existence of contract for carriage. It is not necessary to the status of one as a common carrier that a contractual relation should exist between the carrier and shipper with respect to the transportation.[34] On the other hand, the fact that a carrier makes written contracts with his patrons is not controlling;[35] and one who fulfills the conditions essential to render him a common carrier does not, as will hereinafter appear, see infra § 5, become a private carrier by making individual contracts with shippers.

The distinction between a common carrier and a private carrier is a matter necessarily involved in the decisions heretofore cited in which the characteristics of common carriers are stated. If the carrier so holds himself out as engaged in public service for all persons indifferently, as to make him liable for refusal to accept employment offered, he is a common carrier, see cases supra this section, otherwise he is a private carrier, as defined and discussed in § 4 infra. A common carrier also differs from a private carrier in respect to the risk, the former being regarded by the law as an insurer, as stated in § 71 infra, the latter being liable like ordinary bailees as will appear in § 13 infra.

(2) Carriage of Particular Kinds of Property

A carrier who holds itself out as engaged in the business of carrying particular kinds of property, such as money and other valuables, or livestock, is a common carrier as to such property.

To constitute a carrier a common carrier of goods, it is not essential that it carry all kinds of property; if it holds itself out to the public as engaged in the business of carrying only a particular kind of property, it is a common carrier of such property only, and is under no duty to carry other kinds.[36]

Money or other valuables. The liability of a carrier as a common carrier for the loss of money or currency delivered to it for transportation depends on whether or not it has held itself out generally to carry such articles.[37] There is no presumption that an ordinary carrier assumes to act as a common carrier of money or currency and the assumption of that status must be proved by the party alleging it.[38] No contract of a carrier to transport money as a common carrier can be implied from the fact that the carrier has held itself out as a common carrier of goods, wares, and merchandise generally,[39] nor does the transportation by the carrier of money for an express company, under a special contract, have that effect.[40] Nevertheless, a carrier may be a common carrier of money as well as of goods, or, expressing this proposition in other terms, a carrier may render itself liable as a common carrier of money by holding itself out to the public as such.[41]

Live stock. It has been held that, at common law, the obligation of a common carrier does not necessarily extend to the carriage of live stock, where that is not a part of the business which the carrier holds itself out to transact;[42] but by the weight of authority a carrier is a common carrier of live stock accepted by it for transportation,[43] subject to the rule applicable in case of other goods, that it is not accountable for loss resulting from the inherent nature of the property, and not due to any negligence or fault on its part, as stated infra § 79; and it is immaterial whether the carriage of live stock is the carrier's principal business, or whether it is incidental or subordinate.[44]

(3) Transportation for Hire or Reward

An essential characteristic of a common carrier is that the services performed must be for hire.

The definitions of a common carrier, supra § 3 a, include the element of hire or reward; and while private carriers also usually carry for hire, they may carry gratuitously, infra § 4. No person is a common carrier in the sense of the law who performs the service without hire;[45] and where there is no right to remuneration, the party who carries incurs no liability other than that of a gratuitous bailee.[46] It is not necessary, however, that there be an express contract for compensation;[47] hence the fact that the carrier intended to carry goods gratuitously, without having indicated that intention to the shipper, will not relieve such carrier from his usual liability.[48] If by reason of usage, or the general nature of the business, the right to compensation arises by implication, the carrier is liable as a carrier for hire;[49] nor is it necessary that compensation be provided for under an express or implied agreement to pay for the particular service.[50] If the transportation is a part of an undertaking on the part of the carrier, for which there is a valid consideration, it will be a carriage for hire, although it is agreed that, in connection with the general advantage resulting to the carrier from the entire transaction, this particular part of the service is to be rendered without charge.[51]

(4) Ownership of Means of Transportation

To constitute one a common carrier he need not own the means of transportation.

To constitute one a common carrier, it is not essential that he should own the means of transportation.[52] If the contract is that the goods will be carried and delivered, it makes the one so contracting a common carrier, regardless of the name or the ownership of the line or lines over which the service extends,[53] as in the case of express and transportation companies, which, as shown in § 7 infra, are universally held to be common carriers, and in the case of companies owning no cars of their own and transporting the cars of other companies.[54] So, a common carrier cannot change its public character by private contract with shippers to haul freight over its tracks from one industrial track to another industrial track, whether owned by the shipper or the carrier.[55]

§ 4. Private Carrier

A private carrier is one who undertakes by special agreement in a particular instance to transport property without being bound to serve every person who may apply.

A private carrier of goods has been defined as one who, without being engaged in the business of carrying as a public employment, undertakes to deliver goods in a particular case for hire or reward;[56] but this definition is not strictly correct in so far as it implies that one who does not carry for hire or reward is not a private carrier; and more accurately stated, a private carrier is one who, without making it a vocation, or holding himself out to the public as ready to act for all who desire his services, undertakes, by special agreement in a particular instance only, to transport property from one place to another either gratuitously or for hire.[57] He carries only for persons with whom he has an initial contract, and assumes no obligation to carry for others,[58] and in this lies the chief distinction between a private carrier and a common carrier,[59] the latter as before stated, supra § 3 b (1), being bound to carry for all who may apply.

§ 5. Common Carrier Acting as Private Carrier

A common carrier may, by special contract, act as a private carrier, but cannot by such contract avoid the duties required of common carriers.

A common carrier may, under some circumstances, act as a private carrier, and when, as a matter of accommodation or special engagement, a common carrier undertakes to carry something which it is not his business to carry, he becomes a private carrier, pro hac vice.[60] A common carrier cannot, however, avoid the duties required of him as such carrier, by insisting on a special or private contract with the shipper.[61] It has also been held that, while the same person may be engaged in one line of business as a common carrier and in another line of business as a private carrier,[62] the same facilities cannot be used at the same time in both common carrier and private carrier transportation.[63]

The question whether a contract of carriage changes the relation of the carrier from that of a common carrier to that of a private carrier is one of law.[64]

Carrier employed by one or a definite number of persons by a special contract or for a special undertaking, is a private carrier.—Hissem v. Guran, 146 N.E. 808, 112 Ohio St. 59.

If the undertaking be a single transaction, not a part of the general business or occupation engaged in, as advertised and held out to the general public, then the individual or company furnishing such service is a "private" carrier.—Cushing v. White, 172 P. 229, 101 Wash. 172.

59. Distinction between "common" and "private" carrier is that former holds himself out in common to all persons who choose to employ him while latter agrees in special cases to carry for hire.—Koppers Connecticut Coke Co. v James McWilliams Blue Line, D.C.N.Y., 18 F.Supp. 992, affirmed, C.C.A., 89 F.2d 865, certiorari denied James McWilliams Blue Line v. Koppers Connecticut Coke Co., 58 S.Ct. 25.

Test in determining whether a carrier is a "common carrier" or a "private carrier" is whether or not the enterprise is open to the use and service of all members of the public who may require the service to the extent of its capacity.—Marshall v Public Service Commission, 195 A. 475, 129 Pa.Super. 272.

Making of contract considered, but not conclusive

Although the fact that a carrier makes a contract in every case in which he transports property is to be considered in determining whether or not he is a common carrier, it is not conclusive, since he might make such contracts merely to escape the duties of a common carrier by subterfuge or evasion.—Weaver v. chises are affected with a public interest, are ordinarily held to be common carriers of goods delivered to them for transportation, although their charters do not specifically so provide.[65] In some jurisdictions, railroads are by express constitutional or statutory provision declared to be common carriers;[66] and it is immaterial, under such provisions, whether the incorporators did or did not intend the railroad to be a common carrier.[67] These provisions, however, are merely declaratory of the common law as it already existed.[68] Even before the road is completed, goods received for transportation on construction trains may be deemed to have been received for transportation by the company as a common carrier.[69] An agreement between a railroad and an express company for the transportation of light freight on passenger trains does not relieve the railroad company from liability as a common carrier to one who had no notice that the business was not being done by the railroad company.[70] A railroad is none the less a common carrier because it maintains no freight station and issues no bills of lading.[71]

Railroad receivers and trustees. A receiver appointed by the court to operate a railroad is a common carrier, the same as the corporation which he represents, so far as he transacts the business of carrying goods,[72] and is subject to the same rights and duties.[73] Trustees who purchase at a foreclosure sale and operate the road under a decree authorizing them to do so are liable as common carriers for goods received by them while thus operating the road,[74] and they are not in possession of the property as receivers, and are not relieved from liability on the ground that they stood in that relation to the court, since they are accountable, not to the court, but to the bondholders; nor are they released from their liability as common carriers by a conveyance of the property to a new company organized in obedience to a decree of court, where

Railroad company exercising all its franchises is a "common carrier."—Chicago & E. I. Ry. Co. v. Chicago Heights Terminal Transfer R. By organizing under the general Railroad Act, a railroad company assumes a duty to serve the public as a common carrier—Kenna v. Calumet, H. & S. E. R. Co., 206 Ill.App. 17, affirmed 120 N.E. 259, 284 Ill. 301.

Railroad constructed by United States as war measure

That a right of way for a railroad, acquired by the United States during war to aid in spruce production, was taken by it under the war power or right of eminent domain, does not charge it and the road built thereon by such government with a public use, giving the public a right to demand a common carrier service as to freight. Conveyance by the United States of the right of way, and a road built thereon by it, to a corporation organized, owned, and used by it for the same war purpose, did not charge the property with a public use so as to make the company a common carrier of freight. The railroad was not charged with a public use by temporary gratuitous permit to operate it while a corporation organized by the government was winding up its affairs after close of war. That purchaser of such railroad, on close of war, consented to continuance for two months, until it was ready to begin logging operations, of operation of road by an individual, begun under temporary permit from government instrumentality, did not charge the road with a public use.—McCoy v. Pacific Spruce Corporation, C.C.A.Or., 1 F.2d 853, affirming, D.C., Pacific Spruce Corporation v. McCoy, 294 F. 711.

Application of statute

Where a buyer of timber who was given a right of way over the lands, constructed a standard gauge railroad and equipped the same with two locomotives, which were used to haul timber products, etc., it was held that although the buyer was an individual, yet he was included within the term "railroad corporation" as defined by Rev.St.1909 § 3214, and hence such railroad became a common carrier under §§ 3174, 3179, even though its original business was practically confined to the transportation of timber products, such road continuing to serve the surrounding territory after exhaustion of the timber.—Idalia Realty & Development Co. v. the act or contract as common carrier was done or entered into before the transfer took place.[75]

Lessee of railroad franchise. The lessee of the franchise of a railroad company which is a common carrier is also a common carrier.[76]

Declaration of public service commission. Where a railroad company is not in fact a common carrier, an order of the public service commission declaring it to be such is void.[77]

b. Extent of Use of Facilities in General

The test as to whether a railroad is a common carrier is the right of the public to use it, and not the extent of its use.

Whether or not a railroad is a common carrier does not depend on the extent of its business or use, the real criterion being the right of the public to use its facilities and to demand its services.[78] The character of a regularly organized railroad as a common carrier is not changed by the fact that its facilities are so limited as to enable it to serve only a few customers, or even a single customer,[79] or that it carries only a particular kind of property for a single customer,[80] or because most of its traffic is in its own products, and only a small part of the traffic carried is the property of others.[81]

c. Particular Operations and Kinds of Service

(1) Railroads operated by industrial plants
(2) Railroads operated by stockyard companies
(3) Companies operating branch lines and spurs
(4) Companies operating terminals, belt lines, or switches
(5) Companies transporting cars of other carriers
(6) Companies transporting special trains
(7) Street railway companies
(8) Miscellaneous

(1) Railroads Operated by Industrial Plants

An industrial company authorized to operate a railroad may become a common carrier if it holds itself out as such, but it is only a private carrier if it carries only its own products.

A lumber company which is authorized by its charter or articles of incorporation to operate railroads, either generally, or for the purpose of transporting its own products, may become a common carrier although it is not incorporated as such,[82] and the fact that the company has never exercised the right of eminent domain and does not possess such right, that the railroad lines maintained by the company are only temporary structures, and that the company maintains no stations or depots, does not prevent it from being a common carrier if it is such[83] within the rules laid down in § 3 b. However, a system of internal trackage constructed and operated by an industrial corporation to meet the requirements of its own business in the process of manufacture is a mere plant facility and not a common carrier.[84] A lumber company does not become a common carrier where it transports goods for such persons only as it chooses to make contracts with, and as a necessary part of its lumber business, and carries passengers for hire, only as an accommodation for a railroad company to which it pays over the fares collected by it.[85] So, a company organized as a railroad company for the purpose of conveying its own product, and which does no other business except occasionally to carry goods for others without charge, or at a charge less than

Acts constituting company common carrier

A lumber company which owned and operated a railroad for transportation of its own products, but subsequently extended its road into an oil field, and held itself out as willing to carry any freight offered under private contract, was a common carrier, although not authorized by its charter to operate as such.—Smitherman & McDonald v. the cost of the service, is not a common carrier, although its charter gives it the broad powers of such services.[86]

A logging railroad, holding itself out to the public as a common carrier, and having the power of eminent domain, cannot deny that it is a common carrier merely because it has never operated as such.[87] On the other hand, a logging railroad which carries only its own products and does not hold itself out as a common carrier, is not such a carrier;[88] and the fact that it exercises the power of eminent domain is immaterial.[89] The rules are also applicable to industrial companies operating branch lines and spurs, see infra subdivision (3).

(2) Railroads Operated by Stockyard Companies

Stockyard companies owning and operating tracks to and from their yards for the transportation of live stock for others are common carriers.

Stockyard companies are common carriers where they are made such by the terms of their charters, hold themselves out as such, and constantly act in that capacity, and are so treated by the railroad systems which use them;[90] and the fact that a stockyard company by means of a lease to another terminal company divests itself of the operation of the railroad system which it was authorized by its charter to construct and operate, and which for many years it did in fact operate, does not affect its character as a common carrier where it still continues to perform the customary stockyard operations, and by the terms of the lease gets a share of the profits received by the terminal company for performing the service in connection with the railroad transportation.[91] It is immaterial that the company has no cars of its own but transports cars of other companies only, or that it operates its road only for a short distance.[92] Where the company carries on no other business than that of transportation for others, it is a common carrier, although it does not deal with the general public but only with the railroad companies whose lines connect with its transfer line and with the industries located on the margin of its premises, and with the consignees and consignors of live stock who receive shipments or load shipments in its yards.[93]

(3) Companies Operating Branch Lines and Spurs

Companies maintaining branches and spurs are common carriers if such facilities are used for general transportation purposes, otherwise not.

Where a railroad company is vested by charter with power to construct branch lines, and they are constructed and operated for the purpose of general transportation, the company becomes a common carrier as to such branches and is subject to the rules governing such carriers.[94] If the purpose of the company is to maintain and operate branch or spur tracks as a part of its system so as to serve all who may desire service, the company becomes a common carrier as to such branch or spur lines, without regard to the amount or proportion of freight carried thereon for the general public,[95] and although the track at the outset may lead only to a single industry[96] or was constructed merely as a plant facility,[97] and its character as a common

Charges collected from others

In a proceeding involving question of whether a lumber company operating a railroad was as to such railroad a common carrier, insufficiency of evidence as to the exact sums collected from outside persons is immaterial, where sum so collected was inconsequential as compared with the freight carried by the railroad for the company itself.—State v. Public Service Commission of State of Washington, 203 P. 3, 117 Wash. 453, denying rehearing 201 P. 765, 117 Wash 453.

carrier is not affected by the fact that the traffic is furnished mostly by one or a few industries situated on the branch or spur tracks,[98] or that the proprietors of such industries contributed to the cost.[99] A railroad company which is in the exclusive control of stub or tap lines joining its main line, and which owns the rails and fasteners and maintains the tracks and roadbeds in condition, and which maintains a distance mileage tariff for freight originating on the stub lines the same as from points on its main line, is a common carrier, although the roadbed and the ties of the stub line roads are owned by lumber companies.[1] So, a railroad company which serves business houses along a spur track which is not one of its regular sidetracks nor owned by it, by delivering to them cars of freight and cars to be freighted and shipped is a common carrier with respect to the use it makes of this track.[2]

However, there is a clear distinction between spurs which are owned and operated by a common carrier as a part of its system and under its public obligation and merely private sidings.[3] Thus, a spur railway line built by a lumber company on its own land, forming a connecting line between a railroad and its mill, some miles distant, for the purpose of transporting its own products to the railroad for shipment, which had no rolling stock except an engine and logging cars and which neither did, nor held itself out to do, carrying for the public, is not a common carrier.[4] Railroad tracks connecting ironworks with the track of an interstate railroad on the grounds of the iron company and engines used thereon are mere plant facilities, although transferred to a separate company organized as a railroad, and the latter is not a common carrier entitled to share in the interstate rates so far as related to the business of the iron company.[5] It has also been held that the fact that a motor car for mail and passengers was run over a spur track belonging to a private carrier does not establish the fact that the spur was operated as a public carrier of freight.[6]

The question as to whether branch lines were constructed and were actually used for purposes of general transportation, so as to make the operator a common carrier as to them, is a question of fact to be determined by the jury.[7]

(4) Companies Operating Terminals, Belt Lines, or Switches

Terminal companies, belt lines, and companies switching cars of others, may be common carriers.

Terminal companies are common carriers, when so made by the terms of their charters, or where they hold themselves out as such and constantly act in that capacity and are so treated by the great railroad systems which use them,[8] even though they own no cars of their own and transport only the railroad cars of other companies.[9] A railroad company incorporated under a statute authorizing the formation of corporations for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating railroads for public use, and engaged chiefly in switching cars of other railroad companies, is a common carrier,[10] and the same is true of a railroad company doing a general business in switching cars over its switch tracks to and from warehouses situated on its spurs and switches and delivering them on the transfer tracks of other railroad companies in the same

Exclusive service to manufacturing company

A railroad, organized under the general railroad act, which operated about five miles of switch tracks of standard gauge within the plant of a coke corporation partly included within a fence inclosing the corporation's plant and connected with delivery tracks, and whose only business was in switching cars for the coke corporation between its plant and the delivery roads, and which through its connections was bound to receive from, and deliver to, the coke corporation cars consigned to, or shipped by, it over four different railroads to and from points within and without the state and which received pay for such services as a part of the general freight rate paid by the shipper for the whole carriage, was not a mere facility of the coke corporation, but was a common carrier. —Kenna v. Calumet, H. & S. E. R. Co., 120 N.E. 259, 284 Ill. 301.

town,[11] or operating between freight terminals and delivery cars at various private sidings.[12] So, a railroad company taking loaded cars from its connection with another railroad and transferring them by means of a switch engine over a portion of its own track to a spur of its own and receiving its compensation from the connecting road acts as a common carrier and is liable as such for the safety of the goods transported, no matter how short the distance from the place of receipt to that of delivery.[13] A belt line switching whole trains on its own line from a given station to stockyards,[14] or which receives and transports cars and freight offered it by rail carriers, steamboat companies, or industrial plants along the waterfront of a harbor, with wharf and track connections and direct service to industrial plants,[15] is a common carrier. On the other hand, it has been held that where a corporation, which is under no legal obligation so to do, voluntarily contracts to switch cars over its tracks between two or more railways, for which service it collects a certain switching charge for switching the cars loaded or empty, but charges no traffic rates on the freight transported or transferred in the cars, such corporation in the performance of such service assumes none of the responsibilities of a common carrier, but only those of a switchman;[16] and one who constructs a railroad switch, under a statute authorizing the owner of a coal mine within three miles of a railroad to condemn a right of way for a railroad switch to get his product to market, and providing that the owner of such road shall be, so far as they are applicable, governed by the laws relating to other railroads is not a common carrier, in contravention of a constitutional provision that no corporation engaged in the business of common carrier shall own a mine, so that it can either ship or permit to be shipped by the lessees of its mine all products thereof free of charge.[17]

A wharf company chartered as a transportation company, owning railroad trackage connecting with railroads and operating switches, and having on file with the proper authorities tariffs covering its charges for various services, is a common carrier.[18]

(5) Companies Transporting Cars of Other Carriers

A railroad may be a common carrier as to loaded freight cars of another road received for transportation; but the railroad is not a common carrier of common carriers of passengers.

A railroad company which receives loaded freight cars of another road for transportation thereby assumes the obligations of a common carrier in respect to such cars,[19] its liability being the same as when it undertakes to transport ordinary freight.[20] However, a railroad company is not a common carrier of common carriers of passengers;[21] it owes no duty to sleeping car companies to haul their cars, and may impose the terms on which it will haul such cars.[22] Furthermore, as regards ordinary freight cars, it has been held that, if they are destroyed after the carriage has terminated, and after delivery, or tender to deliver, to the consignee, there is as to the cars no liability as a common carrier. In other words, although the cars remain on the tracks of the transporting carrier, its liability is that of a warehouseman only.[23]

(6) Companies Transporting Special Trains

A railroad transporting special trains belonging to the person for whom the service is rendered is, ordinarily, not a common carrier as to the property transported on such trains; but it may become such.

A railroad company which furnishes men and motive power for the transportation of special trains, such as a circus train, belonging to the person for whom the service is rendered, is not a common carrier with reference to the property transported on such train,[24] but it has been held otherwise in a case where cars of the person for whom the service was being rendered were injured while the train in which they were being hauled was under the control of the conductor as agent of the railroad company, and were injured in the operation of the road.[25] The mere fact that the car in which the property is being transported belongs to the owner of the property may not relieve the railroad company from the "ordinary" liability of a carrier.[26] So it has been held that a railroad company, by publishing and filing its tariffs, classifications, and rules for the transportation of show companies, in accordance with the law, held itself out as a common carrier of such companies, and by giving a show company an option of transportation at a higher rate, according to the tariffs, etc., or at a reduced rate, admitted willingness to transport the show company as a common carrier.[27]

(7) Street Railway Companies

A street railway company may become a common carrier of goods.

A street railway company may become a common carrier of goods by the practice of permitting passengers or others to put freight in its cars to be carried for extra hire.[28]

(8) Miscellaneous

A company furnishing refrigerator or other specially constructed cars to railroads is not a common carrier. A connecting carrier transporting goods for hire is a common carrier, but not where it transports gratuitously.

A company which owns and maintains refrigerator, tank, or box cars which it lets to railroads or shippers, but owns no railroad lines and has no control over the motive power or the movements of the cars so furnished, is not a common carrier.[29]

A railroad connecting carrier which accepts from an initial carrier freight to be delivered at a point on the connecting carrier's route, and transports it over its own tracks from the terminus of the initial carrier to the point of destination, is a common carrier, notwithstanding its remuneration is received from the initial carrier alone; but if the services of the connecting carrier are gratuitous, it is not a common carrier.[30]

§ 7. Express and Transportation Companies

An express company receiving goods for transportation in the usual course of business is a common carrier. It is otherwise where a company is not engaged in, and does not hold itself out as, carrying for the public generally.

Express business is a "branch of the carrying trade, that has, by the necessities of commerce and the usages of those engaged in transportation, become known and recognized so as to require the court to take notice of the same, as distinct from the ordinary transportation of the large mass of freight usually carried on steamboats and railroads,"[31] the term involving the idea of regularity as to route or time, or both.[32] An express company is "a company engaged in the business of carrying for hire money, goods, and parcels from one locality to another."[33] Express companies are essentially different from railway companies, not only in the fact that the latter carry more bulky freight, but they collect money, and do other things that would be held ultra vires, if attempted by a railroad company.[34] An express company receiving property for transportation in the ordinary course of business, from anyone who chooses to hire its services, is a common carrier of such property.[35]

Another definition

An express company is a firm or corporation (usually a corporation) engaged in the business of transporting parcels, or other movable property, in the capacity of a common carrier, and especially undertaking the safe carriage and speedy delivery of small but valuable packages of goods and money.—America Ry. This is so for the reason that the business of an express company as usually conducted involves continuous custody of goods received as bailee from the time of their receipt until their final delivery, although the transportation thereof is to be effected by means of vehicles belonging to and controlled by others, the person furnishing the transportation being an employee in that respect of the express company.[36] In some jurisdictions by constitutional or statutory provision express companies are declared to be common carriers;[37] and the failure of such companies to comply with the provision of the act will not relieve them from responsibility.[38] The name or style under which they assume to carry on their business is immaterial when their real business is that of a common carrier.[39] They cannot evade their common-law liabilities by calling themselves "express forwarders" or by attempting to appear as agents only.[40] Likewise, so-called transportation or dispatch companies or fast freight lines not owning or controlling any means of conveyance which contract for through transportation of goods in cars which are taken on various lines of road to the destination of the goods are common carriers;[41] and the carriers employed by such a company are its agents.[42]

The rule that a carrier may be a common carrier of money as well as of goods, supra § 3 b (2), perhaps is more frequently applied in the case of express companies,[43] it being said that it is peculiarly the business of express companies to carry money.[44] A corporation authorized by its articles of incorporation to forward merchandise and freight of every description between and within certain towns by means of buses, wagons, automobiles, or other methods of transportation, "and to carry on generally the business of . . . carriers of personal property of every description," is a common carrier.[45] A transportation company engaged in transporting moving picture films for theaters and exchanges under special contracts, exclusively operating over fixed routes, but not advertising or soliciting business, nor holding itself out as ready to transport for the public indiscriminately, is not a common carrier;[46] nor is an express company a common carrier if it merely acts as agent for the shipper in arranging for the transportation and storage of goods, without having possession, or transporting them as a common carrier.[47]

§ 8. Draymen, Carters, Truckmen, Etc.

Persons engaged in the business of draymen, truckmen, etc., for the transportation of goods for hire to anyone desiring their services, are common carriers; but they are not common carriers if they do not hold themselves out as such, and carry only under private contract with one or more persons.

Persons who engage in the business of draymen, carters, truckmen, wagoners, or public moving van companies for the transportation of goods and merchandise, and who hold themselves out as willing to serve all who apply and pay their charges, are common carriers in respect to the carriage of such goods and merchandise as they make a business of carrying,[48] and it is immaterial what mode of

Rule stated in Corpus Juris, as embodied in this and the two following text statements, has been approved in Zajic v. Johnson, Neb., 253 N.W. 77, 78; and Corpus Juris has been cited in support of this rule in transportation is employed,[49] or that there is no regular tariff of charges.[50] A person who uses his trucks partly in the prosecution of his own business, and partly in hauling goods for the public for hire, is a common carrier to the extent that the trucks are used for the latter purpose.[51] So, a person hauling freight by truck, at regular rates, for over ninety per cent of the shippers in his territory, is a common carrier, although all of such shippers were members of an association organized by him.[52] If a truckman transporting goods from a wharf of the initial carrier to a freight station of the delivering carrier is the agent of either the initial or the delivering carrier, the truckman may be considered a participant in the transportation of goods for his principal as the common carrier.[53]

On the other hand, draymen, truckmen, and other persons of the character under discussion, who transport goods under private or special contract with one or more persons, and do not hold themselves out as willing to serve the public indiscriminately, are not common carriers;[54] and the fact that a person or company transporting goods under such circumstances was authorized to do a general trucking business for the public, is immaterial,[55] the test being, as stated in § 3 b (1) supra, not what the carrier was empowered to do, but what it was actually engaged in doing. So, it has been held that a local stage line hauling express matter to railroad stations, is not a common carrier.[56]

§ 9. Transfer Companies

Companies engaged in the business of transferring freight to or from railroad or steamship depots are common carriers if they hold themselves out as ready to carry for hire the goods of all who may apply.

Transfer companies engaged in the business of transferring freight to or from railroad or steamship depots, or between different parts of towns or cities, are not inherently common carriers;[57] whether they are or are not depends on the manner in which they conduct their business, that is, whether they hold themselves out as common carriers, and the character of their operations.[58] If such com-

Persons held not common carriers

(1) Truck owners not holding themselves out as willing to serve the public generally, but hauling produce of their own and other farms under private contracts, including one with a producers' association which was not shown to be a common carrier, and expressly stipulated in the contract that no goods should be hauled except as directed by it, are not common carriers.—Public Utilities Commission of Ohio v. Holdren, 171 N.E. 255, 34 Ohio App. 416.

(2) Truck owner, transporting butter and eggs for creamery company under special contract, providing for carrying of insurance by such company at such owners' cost, was held not "common carrier," but "private carrier" or "bailee" when cargo was taken by robbers, although loss under insurance policy was fully paid to consignor.—Beatrice Creamery Co. v. Fisher, 10 N.E.2d 220, 291 Ill.App. 495.

(3) An owner of motor trucks engaged in hauling household goods and personal effects for hire, under private contracts, such trucks not traveling on regular routes nor between established termini, is not a common carrier.—Klein v. Baker, 296 P. 631, 112 Cal.App. 157.

(4) Truck driver engaged in the transfer business in a certain place under license, but not licensed to engage in such business in another city and not pursuing the business of carrying goods over a route from such other city to a third city, and never having held himself out as undertaking to carry goods for the public generally between them, did not, in undertaking to transport goods between such places in a particular instance, assume the liability of a common carrier.—Ney v. panies hold themselves out as willing to transport goods for all who apply and are ready to pay the charges demanded, they are common carriers with reference to such business.[59]

§ 10. Forwarding Agents

A mere forwarding agent is not a common carrier unless he so conducts his business as to lead the public to believe he is such.

A forwarder or forwarding agent who, as agent for the shipper, merely contracts for the transportation of goods by carriers, and who has no interest in the freight but receives compensation from the shipper as his agent, is not a common carrier,[60] and is liable only for want of ordinary care.[61] He is not an insurer of the safety of the goods during transportation, or before, as is a common carrier, discussed hereafter in § 71, but is liable only for his own negligence or that of his agents.[62] However, where persons calling themselves forwarders are so conducting their business as to lead the public to believe that they are carriers, and are employed as carriers to ship goods without any knowledge of their true character, they are liable as common carriers.[63] Thus, an alleged forwarding agent who receives goods for transit, issues bills of lading, makes contracts in his own name with a railroad company for carriage, is, as to a person with whom he contracts for the delivery of goods, a common carrier and liable as such.[64] He is also a common carrier where he hauls the goods in his own vehicles to a railroad, and the goods are to be delivered to his agents at the place of destination, to be delivered by them finally to the consignee,[65] or where he undertakes to transport merchandise and delivers it to a carrier, paying the freight and providing for reimbursement by draft attached to the bill of lading.[66] So, where a forwarder undertakes to transport property from one city to another, for through rates less than the published rates for broken lots, which he is enabled to do by accumulating property for the given destination until a car can be filled, and a carload is billed to his distributing agent at the point of destination, the forwarding agent, while holding the property for accumulation, assumes the liability of a common carrier.[67]

Where a carrier undertakes to transport goods to their destination, deliver them to a purchaser, and return the purchase money received to the consignor, it is a carrier as to the transportation of the goods and an agent as to the sale, and a carrier again as to the money while transporting it to such consignor; and for loss of the money it is, therefore, liable, not only in case of negligence, but also under the same conditions that would charge liability on a carrier,[68] but with reference to custody of goods at destination, it may be bailee only.[69]

The status of an initial carrier as a forwarder is treated infra § 414.

§ 11. Companies Operating Pipe Lines

Pipe line companies, operating such lines as a public business for hire, are common carriers; but where they transport oil under private contract for particular persons, they are not common carriers.

An oil company which owns and operates a pipe line as a public business, holding itself out as ready to transport oil for all persons who may offer it for transportation for hire, is a common carrier,[70] and is sometimes declared to be such by express statutory provisions;[71] but a company constructed solely to transport oil for particular persons under strictly private contracts is not a common carrier, and the state cannot by mere legislative fiat or any regulating order of a commission, convert such private line into a public utility or make its owner a common carrier.[72]

An oil company operating a pipe line for the sole purpose of drawing oil from its own wells to its own refinery is not a common carrier within the statute extending the operation of the Interstate Commerce Act to any persons or corporations engaged in the transportation of oil or gas by pipe lines and declaring that they shall be considered common carriers within the meaning of the act; but, on the other hand, oil companies controlling interstate pipe lines are common carriers within the act where the oil offered for shipment in interstate transportation is accepted only on the condition that the party offering the oil shall sell it to them, or through them, on terms more or less dictated by themselves.[73] Whether the business conducted by a pipe line company is that of a common carrier is a question of fact.[74]

§ 12. Other Common Carriers

Whether or not certain other persons or corporations are common carriers has been considered.

The essentials of common carriers, as laid down in § 3 b supra, determine whether or not persons or corporations engaging in particular kinds of business are common carriers, as, for example, a contractor engaged to cut and transport timber,[75] a distributor,[76] an ice dealer,[77] and a person letting automobiles for hire.[78] Whether or not certain other persons or corporations engaged in particular kinds of business, not discussed in this section or in §§ 6–11 supra, are common carriers, is treated in the various titles relating to such callings. The question in reference to bridge companies is discussed in C.J.S. title Bridges § 69, also 9 C.J. p 475 note 63; the question as to boom companies is treated in C.J.S. title Logs and Logging § 49, also 38 C.J. p 207 note 45; as to ferrymen, in C.J.S. title Ferries § 26, also 25 C.J. p 1075 notes 2, 5; as to irrigation companies, in C.J.S. title Waters § 347, also 10 C.J. p 51 note 61, 67 C.J. p 1375 note 39 [a]; as to owners of vessels generally, in C.J.S. title Shipping § 101, also 58 C.J. p 340 notes 90–7; as to owners of vessels let on charter, in C.J.S. title Shipping § 34, also 58 C.J. p 154 notes 8, 9, 11; as to telegraph and telephone companies generally, in C.J.S. title Telegraphs and Telephones § 7, 62 C.J. p 17 note 87, p 18 note 1; as to telegraph companies transmitting money, in C.J.S. title Telegraphs and Telephones § 248, also 62 C.J. p 272 note 87; as to telegraph companies operating district telegraph and messenger service, in C.J.S. title Telegraphs and Telephones § 277, also 62 C.J. p 298 notes 68–71; as to tugboats, in C.J.S. title Towage § 13, also 63 C.J. p 19 note 19, p 20 note 22; as to warehousemen, in C.J.S. title Warehousemen and

75. Contractor to cut and transport timber

A person contracting under a special contract to cut timber and transport it to a designated place is not a common carrier.—Pike v. Nash, 3 Abb.Dec., N.Y., 610, 1 Keyes 335.

76. Distributor who received furniture purchased in Michigan by furniture dealer and collected there by forwarding company and shipped by rail to distributor as consignee was not "common carrier," as regards liability of distributor for loss of furniture by fire in distributor's warehouse, where his contract with dealer required him only to receive and store furniture and notify dealer of its arrival.—Paine Furniture Co. v. Acme Transfer & Storage Co., 195 N.E. 302, 290 Mass. 195.

77. Ice dealers

A person engaged in the business of buying and selling ice using his truck exclusively in such business, does not become a common carrier because he takes a special job of moving another's household goods.—Hardin v. Grant, Tex.Civ.App., 54 S.W.2d 189.

78. Letting automobiles for hire

One who is in the business of letting automobiles for hire, is not necessarily a common carrier; the determination of the question depending on whether or not he is bound to carry for all who derive such service on tender of proper compensation.—Haddad v. Griffin, 142 N.E. 74, 247 Mass. 369.

Carriers of mail see C.J.S. title Post Office § 31, also 49 C.J. p 1182 note 43–p 1186 note 19.

Operator of "inclines". One who operates an incline for hire and undertakes to carry the cargoes of all vessels plying a river up the incline to the cars of a railroad company is a common carrier.[79]

Stagecoach lines. A stagecoach line is not ordinarily a common carrier of goods, but an established practice of carrying for passengers packages which are not baggage will subject it to liability as a common carrier with respect to such packages.[80] The practice of conveying for hire in a stagecoach parcels not belonging to passengers constitutes the proprietors of the coach common carriers.[81] They may make themselves such either by special contract in a particular case or by their general course of business.[82]

§ 13. Applicability of Law of Bailments

A private carrier, as a bailee for hire, is within the law of bailments as to its liabilities.

A private carrier with or without reward is merely a bailee and his liability is determined by the rules governing the responsibilities of bailees,[83] and the law as to common carriers of goods is said to be a branch of the law relating to the subject of bailments,[84] that is, the carrier of goods is a bailee, and, aside from any considerations of public policy which affect the liability of a carrier conducting a public employment, its duties and liabilities are in general those of an ordinary bailee;[85] but these considerations of public policy[86] have led to the recognition by the courts, from an early period in the history of the common law, of rules, stated infra § 27 et seq, 40 et seq, 71 et seq, 147 et seq, respecting the duty of the common carrier as to serving the public, and as to liability for goods intrusted to its care which do not apply to private carriers of goods or to other bailees.[87] It has been said that, while a common carrier may become a bailee for hire when, as a matter of accommodation or special engagement, it undertakes to carry something which it is not its business to carry, yet when a carrier has a regularly established business for carrying all or certain articles, and especially if the carrier be a corporation created for the purpose of the carrying trade, its character as a common carrier cannot be divested by entering into a special contract.[88] So, it has been held that an express company, made by the constitution a common carrier in its line of business, is in no sense a bailee for hire in respect to such business.[89]

§ 14. Incorporation, Franchises, and Powers

State legislature ordinarily has power to provide for incorporation of carriers; and such carriers may make special contracts not prohibited by law.

State legislatures, except in so far as they may be restrained by constitutional provisions, have power to provide for the organization of corporations to furnish local transportation,[90] and the construction of statutes passed pursuant to such power is governed by the general rules.[91] A common carrier may make special contracts outside its duties to the public, and may make some special contracts relative to such duties, if they are not prohibited by statute or public policy, and under such contracts the carrier is not held to the strict liability of a common carrier.[92] As stated by other authorities, where a service or act is not clearly within the legal duties of a common carrier, so that such carrier has the right to refuse to perform the same, it may contract for the performance thereof, if not ultra vires, in a different capacity from that which rests on it as a common carrier;[93] but it is not the proper business of a common carrier to foster particular enterprises or to build up new industries,[94] and hence, a common carrier exceeds its legitimate powers when it engages in the promotion of town building, although it would result in increased transportation and consequent prosperity for the carrier.[95]

Storage incidental to transportation. Where a carrier does not hold itself out to the public generally as a warehouseman, the storage of freight at terminal points, as incidental to the carrier's business of transporting freight, and free of charge for a specified time, subject to stipulated charges thereafter until the freight is removed, is not ultra vires.[96]

B. REGULATION AND CONTROL OF CARRIERS

The business of a common carrier is subject to governmental regulation and control.

The business of a common carrier with reference to the performance of its public duties is subject to governmental regulation and control,[97] within the limits of the constitution.[98] For the purposes of public regulation, there is a fundamental distinction between the acts of a common carrier in the performance of its public duties as such, and those done in the exercise of its purely private right to manage and control its own property in matters not embraced within its public duties.[99] So long as the service furnished by a common carrier in the discharge of its public duties is adequate, the public is not concerned with the selection of the particular agency through which such service is supplied.[1]

Judicial control. A common carrier of goods is also subject to judicial control to prevent the abuse of its powers and privileges.[2]

§ 16. By State

State has power to make reasonable regulations of the business of carriers, subject to constitutional restrictions.

A state has power to regulate and control common carriers in the operation and management of their business as carriers within the state,[3] except in so far as it is restricted by contract obligation imposed

"It is agreed by all authorities in modern times that common carriers are subject to reasonable regulation by the state, and that such regulation should be exercised so as to pro-

by the charter or the statute under which the carrier is incorporated.[4] Any contract, usage, or practice observed by a common carrier, that has immediate relation to the duties of the carrier to its patrons, although it may be binding as between the parties, is subject to lawful governmental rules and regulations,[5] and a carrier cannot, by making contracts for future transportation, present or postpone assertion by state of the power to regulate it.[6] This power as respects intra-state traffic is in no way affected by the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act.[7] The extent of the control and regulation is for the legislature to determine, subject to constitutional restrictions[8] and the requirement that regulations imposed shall be reasonable,[9] since the legislature cannot under the guise of regulation interfere with the proper conduct of the business of the carrier in matters which do not fairly belong to the domain of reasonable regulation.[10] The constitutional provision conferring the power of regulation, and the statutes enacted thereunder, contemplate that the regulations shall be efficient and adequate to conserve the public welfare.[11] So long as the use continues the power of regulation remains,[12] and extends to every phase of service as common carrier and to every act that affects such service,[13] as appears in subsequent sections dealing with specific regulations, particularly § 19 relating to the carriers, instrumentalities, and facilities subject to regulation, § 278 dealing with the power to fix and regulate rates, and § 350, as to the power to prohibit discrimination. When the legislature in unmistakable terms, and within constitutional limits, has exercised its power to regulate corporations, it should be given full effect, but no inferences unfavorable to the reasonable operation of the franchise of a corporation should be allowed from words susceptible of use in more than one sense.[14] The power of regulation "is a power of government, continuing in its nature, and if it can be bargained away at all it can only be by words of positive grant, or something which is in law equivalent."[15] Furthermore, in determining the extent of the state's power to control and regulate carriers it must be borne in mind that charters under which carriers operate are taken subject to any constitutional provisions existing at the time, which authorize the alteration or repeal of the charters[16] or authorize the legislature to pass laws prescribing certain regulations.[17] Even where the charter exempts a carrier from state regulation in certain respects, the state, nevertheless, has the power to see to it that the carrier keeps within the charter limits.[18]

§ 18. Supervision by Public Officers

a. In general
b. Reports to commission
c. Proceedings in exercise of powers

a. In General

Power of state to regulate common carriers may be exercised through public commissions whose regulations must be authorized by statute or constitution, and be reasonable. Such regulations prevail over conflicting rules of carrier.

The power of a state to regulate common carriers may be, and frequently is, exercised through public service commissions or other like boards and administrative officers,[20] and statutes conferring this power upon such commissions or officers have been held not an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power, as shown in the C.J.S. title Constitutional Law § 138, also 10 C.J. p 54 notes 9–14, 12 C.J. p 850 notes 52–93, the convenience and need of the public, not the benefit of the carriers, being the primary considerations,[21] whose authority is exclusive until revoked by the legislature.[22] The powers of such officers or bodies are limited to those conferred by the statute,[23] liberally construed to promote its objects,[24] or by provisions of the constitution;[25] and the exercise of the powers con-

In absence of special legislation limiting or affecting power given to state railway commission by constitutional provision creating it, adopted on submission under L.1905 c. 233, it would seem that the people have given the commission all the control over common carriers that they themselves would exercise.—In re Lincoln Traction Co., 171 N.W. 192, 103 Neb. 229.

Acts held not authorized

The railroad commissioners of the state of Florida, acting under the authority of Const. art. 16, § 30, by the amendment of art. 5 § 35, adopted in 1898, and by L.1899 p. 76 c. 4700, have no power to require a railroad company to transport freight from any point on its own line within the state to a destination on a connecting line, when it does not appear that it holds itself out to the public to perform such services, nor have the railroad commissioners power to impose penalties on a railroad which refuses compliance with such an order.—State v. Powers conferred by constitution

Under Const. art. 9 § 18, relating to power of corporation commission, the commission has power to adopt and promulgate orders regulating intrastate shipment of cattle.—Shaff v. Kramer, 235 P. 517, 109 Okl. 109.

Only public duties of carrier are subject to the supervision of the railroad commission, under Const. Va.1902 § 156 (b).—City of Portsmouth v. Virginia Ry. & Power Co., 126 S.E. 362, 141 Va. 54, 39 A.L.R. 1510.

ferred is subject, of course, to constitutional restrictions.[26]

Under the constitution of some states the railway commission has independent legislation, judicial, executive, or administratrive powers in so far as necessarily involved in the general regulation and control of common carriers, and such exercise of the commission's powers may be controlled or limited by the legislature.[27] The rules and regulations which the commission is authorized to make must be reasonable,[28] and under constitutional and statutory provisions, in some jurisdictions, such rules and regulations are prima facie just and reasonable, and correct as to the facts found.[29]

The difficulty of making specific enumeration of all such powers as the legislature may intend to confer upon railroad commissioners for the regulation of common carriers in the interest of the public welfare renders it necessary to confer some powers in general terms, and general powers given are intended to confer other powers than those specifically enumerated.[30] The power of a state commission to regulate and control common carriers includes the power to determine whether a company may incorporate for transportation as a common carrier, that being an administrative question,[31] and the same is true as to the determination of the extent of competition in the intrastate transportation of freight.[32] It is within the power of the commission to anticipate and provide for the reasonable requirements necessitated by the prospective growth of the carrier's business.[33] The commission is not deprived of jurisdiction to require service to be furnished by a common carrier to a shipper by the fact that a controversy, arising out of contract, exists between the carrier and shipper and that ultimately the question of the validity of the contract must be determined in a suit at law.[34] A state commission has no power to authorize a carrier to disregard the plain provisions of a statute,[35] or to make local transfer agents the agents of the terminal company or of railroads entering the terminal station.[36] Rules and regulations prescribed by a state railroad commission supersede any rules or regulations prescribed by the carrier which are in conflict therewith.[37] What carriers, instrumentalities, and facilities are subject to regulation by a state through its public service commission, is considered infra § 19.

b. Reports to Commission

Carrier may be required to make reports to railroad commission.

A railroad commission may require a carrier to give notice to such commission of any accident to a train operated by it, where empowered so to do by statute.[38] It is otherwise, however, in the absence of express statutory authority.[39] A public service commission act, which provides that the Extent of jurisdiction

Under the Public Service Company Law, Pa.St.1920 § 18057 et seq., the public service commission has jurisdiction to determine what transportation service is necessary or desirable for the convenience, comfort, and safety of the public. Such jurisdiction extends to municipalities as well as to the state at large. It is an administrative question rather than one of law, and one which must be left in a large degree to the sound judgment of the public service commission.—Collins v. commission shall prescribe the form of the annual reports required under the act to be made by common carriers, that the contents of such report and the form thereof shall conform as near as may be to that required of common carriers under act of congress to regulate commerce, and that the commission may require such report to contain information relative to rates or regulations concerning fares or freights, contemplates a report independently of that required by the general railroad law, or else such report as may be indicated by the commission in the form which it prescribes.[40] Although a statute requires every one operating a railroad under a contract or lease to file the same in the office of the state corporation commission, the object is merely to furnish the commission with information of the lease or its contents; and if the commission treats the filing of a verified copy as a sufficient compliance with the statute a freight rate established in favor of the lessee cannot be declared invalid because there was not a strict compliance with the statute.[41]

c. Proceedings in Exercise of Powers

Whether a carrier is a common carrier subject to regulation is a question for determination of commission, subject to review by courts. A commission may, in determining carrier's status, order the production of books and papers.

A public service commission has jurisdiction to determine preliminarily the question whether or not a particular carrier is engaged in the business of a common carrier so as to be subject to regulation,[42] subject to review by the courts when the commission has acted, as stated infra § 24. The commission is authorized to procure the information necessary to evoke it to determine the question of the carrier's status, and for this purpose may order the production of books and papers bearing on the question; and if it finds that the carrier is a common carrier, the commission may render such orders as it thinks proper, using to that end the processes afforded it by the constitution and laws of the state.[43] In conducting hearings the commission does not sit as a legislative committee for the purpose of formulating a public policy and putting it into effect by the issuance of general rules, legislative in nature, but is limited to an investigation of specific acts of omission or commission on the part of common carriers.[44]

a. Particular kinds of carriers subject to regulation

b. Particular matters subject to regulation

a. Particular Kinds of Carriers Subject to Regulation

(1) In general

(2) Private carriers and common carriers acting as such

(1) In General

Carriers subject to governmental regulation include not only railroads, but any carrier whose mode of operation is such as to constitute it a common carrier.

Although the greater part of the regulations of common carriers is directed against railroads, it is not essential to the power to regulate that a carrier be an incorporated railroad, engaged as such,[45] but any carrier whose property is employed in public transportation service, and which so conducts its business as to constitute it a common carrier under the rules stated in §§ 3, 7–12 supra, is subject to governmental regulation directly by the legislature or through the agency of public service commissions.[46] Persons and companies which may be sub-

Scope of investigation
The public service commission, having instituted investigation as to operation of common carrier pipe line by an oil company and a pipe line company to which it had transferred the pipe line, had right to procure information as to value of the pipe line company's property, and amount of oil transported by it, and its earnings and expenses, and as to cost and value of the pipe line system transferred, and amount of oil transported through it by the oil company, and charges and expenses thereof.—Standard Oil Co. of Louisiana v. Public interest in use
When one in effect sets apart his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he in effect grants such use to the public and as a consequence must submit to be controlled by the public for the com-

jected to governmental control in addition to railroads,[47] whether such railroads are owned and operated by industrial companies, such as lumber or logging companies,[48] or by terminal companies,[49] include express companies[50] although not organized as corporations,[51] pipe lines,[52] and other carriers mentioned supra §§ 6–12, whose status has been determined to be that of common carriers. So, if the owner of private property voluntarily associates the property with that of another for a certain period of time in the creation of a common carrier system, thereby leading the public to believe that the system is tendered to the public for such services as are usually rendered by common carriers, such property is subject to regulation as such during the prescribed period, unless the owner may go into a court of competent jurisdiction and show a right to withdraw the property from public service before the expiration of such period.[53] A statute giving the public service commission jurisdiction over common carriers, and defining the same as including railroad corporations, express companies, etc., and all persons and associations of persons "operating such agencies for public use in the conveyance of persons or property," applies only to the agencies enumerated, and to no others.[54]

(2) Private Carriers and Common Carriers Acting as Such

Under its power to regulate common carriers, a state cannot regulate purely private carriers; nor are private activities of common carriers subject to governmental regulation.

A state under its power to regulate common carriers, has no power, either directly or through its administrative boards or officers, to regulate purely private carriers,[55] and it cannot, by legislative fiat, mon good to the extent of the interest he has created.—Pacific Spruce Corporation v. McCoy, D.C.Or., 294 F. 711, affirmed McCoy v. Pacific Spruce Corporation, C.C.A., 1 F.2d 853.

Corporation organized under private act

Where a corporation organized in 1899 under a private act to operate vehicles as a common carrier in New York City never exercised its alleged powers, it may not now begin to exercise them, unless it complies with Greater New York Charter §§ 74, 1458, Transportation Corporation Law §§ 20, 25, 26, and Public Service Commission Law § 53, relating to permission, supervision, and regulation of such carrier, and its attempt to do so will be enjoined at the suit of a competitor.—Huff v. By organizing under the general Railroad Act a company assumes the duty of a common carrier, subject to the regulatory power of the legislature.—Kenna v. Calument, H. & S. E. R. Co., 206 Ill.App. 17, affirmed 120 N.E. 250, 284 Ill. 301.

Railroads subject to Interstate Commerce Act

(1) The word "organized," in Interstate Commerce Act § 20a subsec. 1, as added by Transportation Act Feb. 28, 1920 § 439, U.S.Comp.St.Annot.Suppl.1923 § 8592a, defining "carrier" as "any corporation organized for purpose of engaging in transportation by railroad subject to this act," is used to describe present and existing status of corporation, and not its status or condition at some past time.—Whitman v. Northern Cent. Ry. Co., 127 A. 112, 146 Md. 580.

(2) Where railroad which was organized and did business for many years as a common carrier leased its system to another, whereby lessee performed actual work of transportation of leased system, but lessor was required to discharge many duties as a carrier, is still organized to act as carrier, and in event of default by lessee must again operate railroad system as a carrier, it still remained a "common carrier," within meaning of Interstate Commerce Act § 20a, as added by Transportation Act Feb. 28, 1920 § 439, U.S.Comp.St.Annot.Suppl.1923 § 8592a.—Whitman v. It is enough to say that no such case is presented here, and we are not to be understood as challenging the power of the state, or of the Railroad Commission under the present statute, whenever it shall appear that a carrier, posing as a private carrier, is in substance and reality a common carrier, to so declare and regulate his or its operations accordingly."—Frost v. transportation of freight and the performance of their duties generally to their patrons,[63] and the fact that such service would be unremunerative and burdensome does not operate to prevent the state from imposing the duty to perform it if the burden to the carrier has some fair relation to the benefits accruing to the public, and the burden of the particular service considered with reference to the entire business of the carrier does not in fact amount to a denial to the carrier of a reasonable compensation for the service rendered by it as an entirety.[64] The power to require reasonable facilities and conveniences for the transaction of its business with the public, it has been said, is as broad and ample as the police power,[65] but it is subject to the limitations that the duty imposed on the carrier must relate to matter which is within the domain and a proper subject of police regulation,[66] that it must be reasonable,[67] and that it should not be extended to bring within its scope private persons or corporations. It can only be invoked in order to promote the public convenience.[68]

In accordance with these rules, carriers may be required to increase the number of trains, where it does not operate a sufficient number reasonably to serve the needs of shippers;[69] to furnish adequate telephone service for the convenience of its patrons;[70] to furnish cars to shippers,[71] to furnish car door boards for box cars carrying coal,[72] to have cotton compressed in transit where the shipper so instructs by a notation on the bill of lading,[73] to maintain icing stations,[74] to provide suitable facilities for the removal of freight from its premises;[75] or to weigh grain shipped in bulk and issue a receipt stating the true weight.[76] Milling in transit,[77] and cleaning, mixing, and storing in transit,[78] are lawful services which may be required of common carriers; and the board of commissioners may determine when and where such services shall be furnished, and what is adequate compensation there-

(2) Connections with, and Facilities to, Other Carriers

Carrier may be required to provide reasonable facilities to other carriers for interchange of traffic, etc.

A railroad carrier may lawfully be required to afford reasonable facilities to other carriers, including facilities for the interchange of traffic and the transportation over its line of freight from, or of cars of, a connecting line.[82] So, a railroad com-

Particular regulations held valid

(1) State Railway Commission had jurisdiction to regulate intrastate business use and charges therefor of team tracks on railroad's belt line in city.—Missouri Pac. R. R. Corporation in Nebraska v. Nebraska State Ry. Commission, C.C.A.Neb., 65 F.2d 557, certiorari denied 54 S.Ct. 72, 290 U.S. 656, 78 L.Ed. 568.

(2) Where the state established a Barge Canal terminal, constructed docks and loading ships and laid railroad tracks of standard gauge through the docks to connect with adjacent tracks of a railroad company, the public service commission properly ordered the latter to provide transportation between such terminal and shippers on its own and on connecting lines, and to furnish necessary rolling stock therefor and to operate the same by its own power and servants, Public Service Commissions Law § 49 subd. 3 par. (a), as amended by L.1920 c. 541, under which such an order was made, being constitutional, since the state had reserved control of corporations to require assumption of such burden.—People ex rel. New York Cent. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, Second Dist., 191 N.Y.S. 636, 198 App.Div. 436, affirmed 134 N.E. 590, 232 N.Y. 606, and certiorari denied Public Service Commission of State of New York v. New York Cent. R. Co., 42 S.Ct. 314, 258 U.S. 621, 66 L.Ed. 795.

Interchange of traffic between railroads and motor transport companies

Railroads may properly be required to interchange traffic with motor transport companies owned, controlled, and operated by other railroads to carry on freight pick-up and delivery service, since such subsidiary corporations must be considered merely as department of parent railroads. Order requiring railroads to interchange traffic with subsidiary corporations organized by other railroads to carry on freight pick-up and delivery service was not unreasonable as requiring additional expense in investigation of claims because subsidiaries were not members of freight claim division of American Railway Association, and not financially responsible, since their acts were acts of parent railroads; nor was such order unreasonable as requiring additional accounting expense because freight in less than carload lots handled through pick-up and delivery service would be handled as express and not as freight, since freight shipments so interchanged would not be changed in character to express. The order was not unreasonable as requiring additional expense in publishing tariffs, since rates applicable were identical with rates applicable between railroads affected and parent railroads, Rev.St.1925, arts. 6445, 6448, 6471.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Railroad Commission of Texas, Tex.Civ.App., 77 S.W.2d 773.

Particular regulations construed

The word "terminal," as used in Public Service Commission Law § 35, providing that every common carrier is required to afford reasonable facilities for interchange of traffic between its lines and those of other common carriers, but that such section shall not be construed to require a carrier to permit any other to use its tracks or terminal facilities, and every common carrier is required to receive from every other common carrier, at a connection point, freight cars of a proper standard, and haul the same through to destination, is applicable, not only to the portion of the main track, sidings, and team tracks used in loading and unloading freight, but also to industrial switches, at which freight shipments terminate, a terminal point being a place of consignment. The word "use," as used in the provision prohibiting use of terminal facilities of one carrier by another, is not confined to actual presence of locomotives, but the passage of any cars thereover. The provision that the law shall not be construed to require a common carrier to permit or allow any other carrier to use its track or terminal facilities, is definite and unambiguous, and prohibits commission from ordering interchangeable use of carrier's terminal tracks.—People ex rel. New York Cent. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission of New York, Second District, 163 N.Y.S. 777, 177 App.Div. 208.

Shipping service to mining company

Order requiring railroad to furnish shipping service to mining company with respect to coal to be shipped over competitive lines, is not violative of Public Utilities Act art. 4 § 44, as requiring furnishing of terminal facilities to another carrier.—Public Utilities Commission v. Cleveland, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 133 N.E. 722, 301 Ill. 219.

Switching freight

Under Rev.St. art. 4535, requiring every railway company doing business in the state to receive all freight and passengers coming to it from a connecting line, and going to points on its line or beyond, and to transport the same to destination or the next connecting line, a railroad company is not compelled to switch freight which was not consigned over its lines from the line of one railroad to that of another in the same city.—Gulf & I. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Texas & N. O. Ry. Co., 56 S.W. 328, 93 Tex. 482, affirming 51 S.W. 1031.

Trackage agreement between two railroad companies

Where one railroad company is granted the right by another railroad company to operate its trains over the tracks of the grantor, so

pany may lawfully be required to provide reasonable facilities to express companies,[83] provided the express company makes a demand for such service, with payment or tender of the proper rate.[84] A railroad company cannot be required to transfer cars delivered to it by another company from its station to another point as a switching service and at switching rates, where such point is beyond the yard limits and on the main line, and the service is performed by trains under regular despatch orders and not under the direction of the yardmaster.[85]

Services voluntarily undertaken. A statute authorizing the public service commission to require railroad corporations and street railway corporations to maintain such switch or other connections with other like companies as it shall deem necessary for the convenience of the public, but declaring that nothing in the act shall give the commission power over street railway companies not engaged in the general business of transporting freight, relates only to compulsory connections and interchange of service, and where a street railway company voluntarily undertakes the joint interchange of light freight with another company, it submits itself to the jurisdiction of the commission, and may be compelled to perform the duty so assumed, adequately, fairly, and reasonably.[86]

(3) Carriage of Particular Articles

With respect to particular articles, the commodities clause of the Interstate Commerce Act and the rule of the interstate commerce commission have been construed and applied.

The commodities clause of the Interstate Commerce Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 1 (8), making it unlawful for any railroad company to transport in interstate commerce any article or commodity—other than timber and as manufactured products thereof—manufactured, mined, or produced by it, or which it may own in whole or in part, or in which it may have any interest, direct or indirect, except such articles as may be necessary and intended for its

as to form a continuous line to and from points on the grantee's road, but under the trackage agreement the grantee has no right to the use of a switch track constructed by the grantor, and connecting the grantor's main track with the mine tracks of a coal company for the convenience of the latter, the duties of the grantee to the public are not the general duties of a common carrier operating on its own road, and it cannot be required to furnish cars to the coal mining company for the transportation of such company's output.—Kanawha & M. Ry Co. v. Public Utilities Commission of Ohio, 117 N.E. 353, 96 Ohio St. 414.

Interstate commerce regulations

(1) The provision of Interstate Commerce Act § 3, Act Feb. 4, 1887, c 104, 24 St. at L. p 380, U.S.Comp. St 1901 p 3155, that the requirement that all railroads shall provide reasonable facilities for the interchange of traffic shall not require one carrier to give the use of its track or terminal facilities to another engaged in like commerce, is not a substantive enactment, but a mere interpretation clause designed to restrain, if necessary, the generality of the language preceding it.—Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. Ry Co. v. Hunt, 86 N.E. 328, 171 Ind. 189.

(2) With respect to services governed by the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended by the Elkins Act, the rule that both carrier and shipper are bound by and cannot alter the terms of service as fixed by the filed regulations, applies to stipulations relating to service facilities within the purview of the act.—Cicardi Bros. Fruit & Produce Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 213 S.W. 531, 201 Mo.App. 609.

83. Mass.—Director General of Railroads v. People's Express, 126 N.E. 417, 235 Mass. 199.
Tex.—Missouri, K. & T. Co. of Texas v. Empire Express Co., Com.App., 221 S.W. 590, reversing, Civ.App., 173 S.W. 222.

Extent of duty and rights of parties

(1) Railroad was under no obligation to furnish express company facilities under Rev.St.1911 arts. 6616, 6617, although contract tendered by express company called for same per cent of gross rates as was provided for by the railroad's contract with another express company, where latter company did a big interstate business and its contract guaranteed a minimum payment, and where contract tendered contained no such guaranty and contemplated only intrastate business. That railroad accepted from express company, which had applied for facilities, certain trucks necessary in the conduct of plaintiff's business for free distribution, issuing its bill of lading therefor with notation, "Deadhead account of contract pending," did not entitle express company, on railroad's refusal to permit the company to do an express business over its line, to recover as damages expenses incurred in the belief that such permission would be granted, where express company made the notation and knew that at such time there was no contract pending. Railroad would not be estopped to decline to enter into a contract with express company because of its acceptance for free distribution of certain trucks necessary in the conduct of the express company's business and issuance of bills of lading therefor with notation, "Deadhead account pending."—Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Empire Express Co., Tex.Com.App., 221 S.W. 590, reversing, Civ.App., 173 S.W. 222.

(2) Railroad may properly require shipments by express on passenger trains to be in charge of messenger, but express shipper cannot compel carrier's baggagemen to act as messengers in compliance with such order, nor does alleged discrimination against particular express company in favor of others furnishing more and different business warrant its refusal, under St.1906 c. 463 p. 2 §§ 196, 197, 201, to comply with such rule, and on such refusal railroad through director general was justified in terminating contract, and in action to enjoin such express shipper from placing shipments on trains after termination of contract, evidence as to rules and regulations in force in another railroad system was properly excluded.—Director General of Railroads v. People's Express, 126 N.E. 417, 235 Mass. 199.

use in the conduct of its business as a common carrier, has been construed as prohibiting a railroad company engaged in interstate commerce from transporting in such commerce articles or commodities under the following circumstances and conditions: (1) When the article or commodity has been manufactured, mined, or produced by a carrier or under its authority, and at the time of transportation the carrier has not in good faith before the act of transportation dissociated itself from such article or commodity. (2) When the carrier owns the article or commodity to be transported in whole or in part (3) When the carrier at the time of transportation has an interest, direct or indirect, in a legal or equitable sense, in the article or commodity.[87]

A company chartered to secure coal mines and mine coal, and to construct a canal and railroad for the purpose of transporting the products of its mines, being also engaged as a carrier by rail in the transportation of coal in the channels of interstate commerce, is a "railroad company" within the meaning of the commodities clause.[88] A railroad company cannot do by indirection that which the commodities clause prohibits, and, irrespective of form, if the facts show that such company occupies the inconsistent position of carrier and shipper, it comes within the prohibition of the act,[89] and hence, if the railroad company owns all of the stock of a producing or manufacturing company and then so controls such company as to deprive the latter of all independent existence and make it a mere agent or department of the railroad, the railroad company has an "interest" within the meaning of the statute.[90] So, where a manufacturing or producing company, such as a coal company, is created with the express purpose that, with stockholders in common, it shall be a party to a contract intended to enable the railroad company to meet the requirements of the commodity clause and at the same time continue the business of buying, mining, selling, and transporting the product, the transportation of such product violates the statute[91] Further, it has been held that the statute applies to an interstate railroad company transporting coal on its road from mines, the capital stock of which is owned by the railroad company, although all the coal mined by the railroad company is sold at the mine and title is passed before the coal is transported to another state.[92] However, a contract between a railroad company owning coal mines and a coal company, by which the latter agreed to buy the coal produced by the former f. o. b. at the mines, and to pay for certain grades a per cent of the general average prices at tidewater points, does not leave in the railroad company after such sales any interest in the coal which rendered its transportation by such company unlawful under the commodities clause.[93]

Articles or commodities manufactured, mined, produced, or owned, etc., by a bona fide corporation in which the railroad company is a stockholder are not included;[94] but combining in a single holding corporation the ownership of all of the stock of a carrier and all of the stock of a producing company may result in such community of interest as to make the transportation of the latter company's products by the carrier a violation of the commodities clause;[95] whether it does so result being a ques-

Common controlling stock ownership

It is insufficient to render such transportation unlawful that a comparatively small number of persons own a controlling interest in both the railroad company and the coal company, and that some of the officers and directors of the two are the same, where the business of each is separately conducted, and no discrimination is shown to have been made by the railroad company in favor of the coal company as a shipper.—U. 95. U.S.—U. S. v. Reading Co., Pa., 40 S.Ct. 425, 253 U.S. 26, 64 L.Ed. 760.

"While the right of a railroad company as a stockholder to use its stock ownership for the purpose of a bona fide separate administration of the affairs of a corporation in which it has a stock interest may not be denied, the use of such stock ownership in substance for the pur-

tion of fact to be determined by the evidence.[96] The mere power of the holding company to control a subsidiary railroad company and producing subsidiary companies whose products are transported by the railroad company, with the attendant possibility of initiating unlawful conditions does not show a violation of the commodities clause;[97] nor does the filing by the holding company of a consolidated income tax return, destroy the separate corporate entities, so as to make the transportation of such products by the railroad company a violation of the clause.[98]

The statute expressly excludes lumber from its operation, and it is not unlawful for a common carrier to carry lumber owned by it; it may treat lumber owned by it in the same manner as other freight.[99] The exception in favor of timber and manufactured products thereof contained in the statute does not render it invalid for discrimination between carriers, and the question of the expediency of such exception cannot affect the question of the power of congress to enact the statute.[1]

Hay purchased by a railroad company for the use of animals employed in operating its coal mines cannot be said to have been necessary for the use of the company in the conduct of its business as a common carrier, within the meaning of the commodity clause of the Act.[2] The statute applies only to commodities transported in interstate commerce, and coal sold to persons outside the state, and delivered to a common carrier consigned to such purchasers, or sold and delivered to another corporation within the state, and by it sold and shipped to purchasers outside the state is not within the prohibition of the Act.[3]

Carriage of explosives see the C.J.S. title Explosives § 9, also 25 C.J. p 198 note 85–p 199 note 97.

Burned cotton. A rule of the Interstate Commerce Commission providing that cotton which has been on fire, and not subsequently repicked and rebaled, must not be offered for shipment until it has been reconditioned or until more than five days have elapsed since the last evidence of fire therein, does not forbid the shipment of cotton which had been part of a larger mass that had been on fire after the expiration of five days, merely because there was fire in other cotton about two hundred yards distant at the time of the shipment.[4]

(4) Systems of Bookkeeping

A state railroad commission may prescribe reasonable methods of keeping accounts by intrastate carriers

Reasonable methods of bookkeeping may be prescribed by a state railroad commission for intrastate carriers; the section of the Interstate Commerce Act authorizing the interstate commerce commission to prescribe a uniform bookkeeping system and prohibiting the keeping of any accounts, etc., other than those ordered by the commission, was directed only against other accounts of matters relating to interstate commerce, and does not preclude a state commission from requiring the keeping of other accounts of matters relating to purely intrastate business. Since the word "system" in the statute giving the commission power to prescribe a system of bookkeeping, means "method," and "bookkeeping" is the art of recording in a systematic manner the transactions of merchants, traders, and other persons engaged in pursuits connected with money, the commission cannot, under such statute, order the apportionment of items of expense to be made on a pose of destroying the entity of a producing, etc, corporation and of commingling its affairs in administration with the affairs of the railroad company, so as to make the two corporations virtually one, brings the railroad company so voluntarily acting as to such producing, etc., corporation within the prohibitions of the commodities clause." —U. Railroad company which functioned as separate corporate carrier under immediate control of its own directors, no one of whom was on board of holding company owning all railroad company's stock, and which owned all its necessary equipment, made its own contracts, managed its own finances, and served its patrons without discrimination, was not "agent," "instrumentality," or "department" of such holding company, and hence railroad company's transportation of products of producing companies whose stock belonged to same holding company was not in violation of commodities clause of Interstate Commerce Act forbidding railroads from transporting in interstate commerce commodities in which railroads are interested.—U. S. v. Elgin, J. & E. Ry. Co., Ill., 56 S.Ct. 841, 298 U.S. 492, 80 L.Ed. 1300, affirming, D.C., 11 F. Supp. 435.

purely arbitrary basis of "car miles" in a certain ratio between passenger and freight traffic, and orders prescribing that certain conclusions and deductions be entered on the books of the railroad are not authorized [5]

§ 20. License Fees and Taxes

Carriers may be subjected to license taxes, or required to procure a certificate of convenience and necessity from the proper public authorities.

The business of common carriers is one which may properly be subjected to the payment of an occupation, privilege, or license tax.[6]

Power to license or tax generally see the C.J.S. title Licenses §§ 4–11, also 37 C.J. p 173 note 72–p 184 note 50.

Express business; municipal license tax. A license tax may be imposed by a city on persons or companies engaged in the express business in the city,[7] and provisions for the apportionment of such taxes between the companies engaged in doing business in the city must be followed [8] A statute authorizing a tax in occupations conducted within a city authorizes a tax on an express business of carrying packages into the city from other cities, or of collecting packages in the city and carrying them to places outside the city;[9] but a statute imposing an occupation tax on one doing an express business by "railroad" has been held not to apply to such business done by electric interurban carriers, where there is nothing in the statute indicating that the word railroad is used in any other than its ordinary meaning.[10]

Certificate of convenience and necessity. In some jurisdictions a company desiring to operate a pipe line for the transportation of natural gas is required, as a condition precedent to procure from the state corporation commission a certificate of public necessity and convenience;[11] and the fact that the granting of such certificate would destroy the value of an existing competitor's property is not ground for refusal to grant the certificate, if public convenience and necessity would be served by granting it.[12] The determination of the question is a matter within the sound discretion of the commission.[13]

§ 21. Exclusive Privileges

A carrier may grant exclusive privileges as to matters unconnected with its duties as a common carrier, but in the performance of its duties as a common carrier, it cannot grant to one person privileges which it denies to others.

In the performance of its duties as a common carrier, a carrier cannot grant to any person privileges or facilities which it refuses to grant to others, but in matters unconnected with, and beyond the scope of, its duties as a common carrier, it may grant to some persons privileges which it denies to others.[14] A terminal company may grant to a telegraph company an exclusive privilege to conduct on the former's premises a commercial telegraph business which is unconnected with the terminal company's business as a common carrier, and such grant is not against public policy.[15] In Kentucky, it has been held that a railroad company cannot grant to one person the exclusive right to go on the company's depot grounds with vehicles for the purpose of receiving freight.[16]

§ 22. Use of Carrier's Premises

A carrier may regulate the use of its premises as it sees fit, if not inconsistent with its duties as common carrier. It is under no duty to allow others to use its premises for purposes not connected with such duties.

A railroad carrier's station grounds must be devoted primarily to public use to the extent necessary for the public objects intended to be accomplished by the construction and maintenance of the railroad as a highway, but this does not prevent the carrier from establishing such reasonable rules in respect to the use of its property as the public convenience and the interests of the carrier may suggest, if such rules are consistent with the purposes for which the corporation was created, and are not inconsistent with public regulations legally established for the conduct of its business.[17] A carrier by railroad is under no common-law duty to permit a coal dealer to construct a coal bin on the railroad right of way for assembling and shipping coal, nor is such duty imposed on the carrier by a statute requiring common carriers to furnish freight transportation at places which it equips and maintains for that purpose.[18] Permission granted by a railroad to the owners of cotton to use a private platform for the storage of cotton is a mere license, which does not authorize a cotton owner to send an agent to remove the cotton for shipment to other points, where the agent was a competitor of the railroad.[19]

Facilities to patrons of telegraph company. A terminal company is not bound to afford patrons of a commercial telegraph company facilities for carrying on business unconnected with the terminal company's duties as common carrier.[20]

§ 23. Contracts in Violation of Regulations

A valid private contract may be entered into by a common carrier with respect to matters not within duties as such a carrier.

A common carrier may make valid private contracts as to matters not within its duties as a common carrier,[21] as for example "intra-plant" switching[22]

Questions relating to the validity and status of contracts in violation of regulations are discussed infra § 130, in connection with special contracts for the transportation of property, and infra §§ 392–397, where the question of contracts in violation of statutes prohibiting discrimination is treated.

§ 24. Judicial Proceedings to Enforce or Restrain Enforcement of Regulations by Statutes or Orders of Railroad Commissions

a In general
b. Injunction

a. In General

The orders of a state railroad commission or other similar body are subject to judicial review; but the courts will not interfere in the absence of clear evidence to overcome the presumption that the acts of the commission are just, reasonable, and within its powers.

Orders of a state railroad commission or other like administrative body, complained of as being unreasonable or beyond the powers of the commission,[23] and the determination by the commission as to who is a common carrier,[24] are subject to appropriate judicial review; and the methods whereby such review can be obtained may be by an action to set aside or rescind the order,[25] by an appeal from such order,[26] or by a suit to enjoin its enforcement, as stated infra subdivision b of this section. Milling in transit being a burden placed on the carrier, the validity of a rule of the railroad commission requiring such service may be contested by the carrier, but by no one else.[27]

In determining the reasonableness of regulations as to facilities to be furnished by the carrier, the courts cannot go further and determine the facilities which they deem reasonable, that being a legislative function.[28] Since the acts of the commission are presumed to be just and reasonable,[29] or, as expressly declared by constitutional or statutory provisions in some jurisdictions are prima facie just and reasonable, the courts will interfere only when it clearly appears that the commission has exceeded its powers;[30] and the findings of the commission will not be disturbed, if there is sufficient evidence to support them.[31] In other words, in determining the reasonableness of the regulations the courts in deference to the governmental functions conferred by law upon the commissioners will not only require the prima facie presumption of reasonableness impressed by the statute on the regulation to be overcome by the admissions or the proofs, but will also require the admissions or the proofs of unreasonableness to be clear and convincing, every reasonable doubt being yielded in favor of the regulation.[32] However, unreasonable regulations are not within the authority conferred by law upon the railroad commissioners, as stated supra § 18 a, and, when regulations appear from the pleadings or the evidence in a case to be unreasonable and violative of constitutional provisions for the protection of private property rights, such unreasonable regulations will not be enforced by the courts.[33] It has been held that, where the court cannot say that orders of a state railroad commission prescribing a system of bookkeeping are unreasonable as a matter of law, it cannot determine that question as one of fact.[34] Where it clearly appears from the pleadings that a regulation of the railroad commissioners is just, it is not necessary for the court to take testimony on the subject.[35] The remedies for enforcing rights under a railroad commission law have been held to be governed exclusively thereby, notwithstanding a provision therein that the act "shall not have the effect to release or waive any right of action . . . for any right, penalty, or forfeiture which may have arisen, or may hereafter arise, under any law of this state."[36] The use of remedies for enforcing obedience to duties imposed by laws passed to accomplish the purposes specified is not taken away by implication by a constitutional provision which after specifying that the legislature may pass certain laws regulating common car-

Determination as to duties of express company in transportation of money

What is the reasonable amount of money which an express company may be required to take the risk of keeping overnight in any given point of shipment is an administrative question rather than one of law. It is a question of fact, or at least a mixed question of law and fact, and one which should be left, in a large degree, to the sound discretion of the public service commission, which has jurisdiction over such matters, and the conclusions of that tribunal are not to be disturbed by judicial interference unless it is made clearly to appear that they are unreasonable and not in conformity with law.—Henderson Coal Co. v. Public Service Commission, 73 Pa. Super. 45.

Extent of competition in intrastate transportation of freight by common carrier is largely matter of policy and administrative question, which must be left to sound judgment and discretion of public service commission, decision of which, based on competent and relevant evidence, will not be disturbed by superior court, unless convinced that it is unreasonable or not in conformity with law.—Beaver Valley Service Co. v. riers further provides for enforcing such laws by adequate penalties and forfeitures.[37] The power of the courts to review the determination of the commission as to the reasonableness of rates, and the proceedings for relief from such rates, whether brought by the carrier, see infra §§ 305–308, or by the shipper or consignee, see infra § 309, or by bondholders, see infra § 310; and the remedies for unjust discrimination, see infra §§ 38 b and 391, are discussed in the sections indicated.

b. Injunction

The enforcement of an unlawful or unreasonable order of a state railroad commission may be enjoined; and injunction will lie in a proper case to restrain a carrier from violating state or federal regulations.

A reasonable exercise by the commission of powers conferred upon it may not lawfully be enjoined,[38] but a court of equity may enjoin the enforcement of arbitrary and unreasonable orders,[39] where the statutes do not provide for a judicial review.[40] So, a shipper who is liable to suffer irreparable injury by reason of an unlawful order by a state railroad commission assuming to regulate interstate commerce is entitled to an injunction restraining the commission from enforcing such order.[41] Under a statute making regulations by the railroad commission conclusive until found otherwise in a direct action brought for that purpose, a suit to enjoin the enforcement of a regulation is a collateral attack thereon and cannot be maintained,[42] although it has been held in the same jurisdiction that, in a suit to set aside an order of the commission as unjust and unreasonable, the court may grant a temporary injunction against the enforcement of such order.[43] Under a statute providing that the railroad commission may prescribe a system of bookkeeping to be observed by railroads, and that the commission shall cause to be prepared suitable blanks with questions calculated to elicit all information concerning railroads and shall furnish such blanks to railroads as often as may be necessary, it was held that, notwithstanding a circular issued by the railroad commission prescribing a system of bookkeeping was objectionable and subject to injunction, it was improper for the court to enjoin the commission from including in subsequent circulars matters which were properly included in the original circulars and which could properly be prescribed as "bookkeeping."[44]

Injunction against carrier. Injunction will lie to restrain one from carrying on the business of a common carrier without obtaining a certificate of convenience and necessity.[45] In a suit by a public utilities commission to enjoin persons from using their trucks as common carriers in hauling produce, where defendants deny that they are common carriers, the burden is on the commission to prove by clear and convincing evidence that they are such carriers.[46]

Violation of Interstate Commerce Act. A single stockholder in a railroad corporation cannot maintain a bill to enjoin the railroad from violating the commodities clause of the Interstate Commerce Act forbidding railroads from transporting in interstate commerce commodities in which they are interested, in the absence of a showing that plaintiff suffered any substantial injury from the violation or that there were any other equities entitling him to injunctive relief.[47] In a proceeding to enjoin a railroad company whose stock was owned by a holding company from transporting in interstate commerce the products of producing companies whose stock belonged to the same holding company, the supreme court, in determining whether or not the railroad company violated the act, should consider not what the corporation had power to do, or did, but what it now has power to do or is doing.[48]

C. RIGHT OF CARRIER TO MAKE REGULATIONS FOR CONDUCT OF BUSINESS

§ 25. In General

A common carrier may make reasonable rules for the conduct of its business, and may alter them on reasonable notice.

A common carrier has a right to conduct its business according to the rules of the common and statutory law;[49] it may make, and enforce by its agents, reasonable and necessary rules for the transaction of its business,[50] with a view to the safety, protection, and preservation of freight,[51] as well as the protection of itself against fraud and imposition,[52] provided such rules are not in contravention of law[53] or of some regulation of the railroad commission,[54] and do not unnecessarily infringe on the rights of the public and others having or carrying on business in connection with railroad traffic and travel.[55] The power of the carrier to make reasonable rules implies power to alter or modify such rules from time to time, as it may deem proper and expedient, on reasonable notice to the public, in order that the interested parties may be apprised of what is required in seeking service at the hands of the carrier.[56] The rules which the carrier adopts for the management of its business are presumptively right and reasonable,[57] and the burden is on him who assails them to prove that they are unfair and unjust, and it is only when it clearly appears by competent evidence that they are unreasonable that commissions or courts may lawfully interfere to annul or to change them.[58]

§ 26. Time, Place, and Method of Receiving Freight

A common carrier may make reasonable rules, not in contravention of law or the regulations of the railroad commission, prescribing the times, places, methods and forms in which goods shall be delivered to the carrier, and the mode of packing, loading, and transporting the same.

A carrier may make and enforce reasonable regulations, fixing the times, the places, the methods, and the forms in which it will receive the various commodities which it undertakes to carry,[59] and

Time of delivery to carrier
A common carrier may make a rule requiring articles to be delivered within the time necessary to ship them in its next ensuing trip. Where an express company made a rule that it would refuse for transportation packages of money to be shipped on the following day, such a provision is not unreasonable or contrary to the regulations of the Public Service Company Law.—Henderson Coal Co. v. Public Service Commission, 73 Pa.Super. 45.

Shipping instructions and receipt for freight
A common carrier, which, under Civ.Code 1910 § 2729, is bound to receive all goods and passengers offered, on compliance with reasonable regulations adopted for its own safety and the benefit of the public, may properly establish a rule that it assumes no responsibility for freight until it has been received with proper shipping instructions and receipted for by its agent.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Smith, 120 S.E. 30, 31 Ga.App. 135.

may make regulations providing how commodities shall be packed or loaded for shipment, so that they may be handled and transported conveniently, safely, and expeditiously,[60] but such rules must not contravene any rule of law or lawful regulation prescribed by the railroad commission.[61] However, the carrier cannot impose unusual conditions on a shipper nor require him to go to unusual expense in delivering his goods for transportation.[62] Regardless of statute, carriers cannot maintain unreasonable regulations for the receipt and transportation of freight.[63]

D. DUTY TO RECEIVE AND TRANSPORT PROPERTY

§ 27. General Rule

Every common carrier is under a duty to receive and transport any property tendered to it for transportation, provided the property is such as it holds itself out as willing to carry, or as it usually carries. A private carrier has no duty to transport goods in the absence of a special contract.

Both under and apart from statutory provisions to that effect, every common carrier is under a duty to receive for transportation and to transport the property of any person tendered to it for transportation, provided the property is such as it holds itself out as willing to carry, or as it usually carries.[64] Such duty arises out of the relationship which a common carrier sustains to the public, and is imposed by law,[65] it exists independently, there-

Private carrier. A private carrier is under no duty to receive and transport goods unless it has entered into a special contract to do so.[69]

§ 28. Excuses for Refusal to Receive and Transport

a. In general
b. Character or condition of property tendered
c. Circumstances beyond carrier's control
d. Other excuses

a. In General

A common carrier's duty to receive and transport property is subject to reasonable limitations and conditions, and, where necessary to the proper conduct of its business, the carrier may declare an embargo on the carriage of property.

The duty of a common carrier to accept for carriage and to carry property tendered, discussed in § 27 supra, is not an absolute one, but is subject to reasonable limitations and conditions.[70] Accordingly, whenever necessary to the proper conduct of its business, a common carrier may lay an embargo on the carriage of property[71] for a limited and definite period, or for an unlimited or indefinite period.[72]

b. Character or Condition of Property Tendered

A common carrier is not required to receive and transport property of such character or in such condition that it cannot be deemed to have held itself out as willing to carry it; nor, except in some circumstances, is it required to haul privately owned cars.

In the absence of statute to other effect, a common carrier is under no duty to receive and transport property of an extraordinary character,[73] or other than it holds itself out as willing to carry.[74] Thus, it has been held that it may refuse to receive and transport property of a dangerous character,[75] although there is authority to the contrary;[76] it may refuse to receive and transport property injurious to the public health, peace or morals,[77] or property the transportation of which is prohibited by law,[78] or the handling of which is

Likewise, a common carrier is under no duty to receive and transport property not prepared for shipment in the manner ordinarily required by it,[80] or property which has been packed or loaded in such a manner,[81] or which is in such a condition,[82] that its transportation would entail extra care and risk.

Cars of another carrier

A carrier is bound to accept and transport the cars of another carrier not a connecting carrier where ordered to do so by the state railroad commission having general supervision of all steam railroads in the state, irrespective of whether it is bound to do so under a statute compelling it to accept and transport the cars of a connecting carrier.—State v Chicago, etc, R Co, 130 N.W. 802, 152 Iowa 317.
Under Emergency Railroad Transportation Act see infra § 922.

Failure to file tariff

A carrier is bound to receive and transport circus cars where ordered to do so by the state corporation commission possessing jurisdiction in the matter, even though the carrier did not file a tariff providing for such transportation.—Southern Pac. Co. v. State, 165 P. 303, 19 Ariz. 20, affirmed 39 S.Ct. 313, 249 U.S. 472, 63 L.Ed. 713.

it has been held that a statute fixing maximum rates where cars are owned or furnished by others recognizes a shipper's right to use its own cars and requires a carrier to haul such cars.[89]

c. Circumstances beyond Carrier's Control

Circumstances beyond a common carrier's control rendering transportation over its line, or that of a connecting carrier, impossible or impracticable excuse its refusal to receive property for shipment; but it must promptly notify the shipper of its inability to render the service demanded.

A common carrier may refuse to receive property for shipment if transportation on its line, or the line of a connecting carrier, has become impossible or impracticable because of circumstances beyond its control,[90] such as a contagious disease of animals,[91] a strike,[92] military control of the carrier's line,[93] or an unprecedented and unexpected rush of business.[94] However, a common carrier must promptly notify the shipper of its inability to render the service demanded,[95] and if it receives property without giving such notice it will be estopped from setting up what otherwise would be a sufficient excuse for refusal to accept such property.[96]

d. Other Excuses

Various circumstances in addition to those considered above have been adjudged available or unavailable as an excuse for a common carrier's refusal to receive and transport property.

In addition to the excuses considered in preceding subdivisions of this section, a common carrier has been held to be under no duty to receive and transport property tendered by a wrongdoer,[97] likewise it may refuse to accept for transportation fuel tendered by a shipper delinquent under a contract to furnish fuel to the carrier for the latter's own use, and necessary to the operation of its trains.[98] A railroad company is not bound to receive goods at places in its line where it has no facilities for doing so.[99]

On the other hand, a carrier has been held not justified in refusing to receive and transport property because of a mere controversy between it and the shipper,[1] or because the point to which the property is to be consigned is not a regular station at which an agent of the carrier is maintained,[2] or because the shipment and marketing of the property offered would injuriously affect the sale and consequently the shipment of other property produced on the carrier's line.[3] So, also, it cannot refuse to receive and transport property pending an inquiry as to whether the consignee will accept the property.[4]

§ 29. Conditions Precedent to Right of Transportation

The conditions precedent to the right of transportation are ordinarily such as relate to a tender of the goods and a prepayment of charges, as considered in §§ 30 and 31 infra.

§ 30. Tender of Goods

A shipper, to be entitled to damages for a common carrier's refusal to receive and transport property, must have properly tendered it, unless informed in advance that it would not be accepted.

To be entitled to claim damages from a common carrier for refusal to receive and transport his property, a shipper must have tendered such property,[5] unless informed in advance that it would not be accepted,[6] to some person authorized to act for the carrier in such matters,[7] or to an agent permitted by the carrier to hold himself out as authorized.[8]

Time for tender. Any regulation as to the time when property should be tendered must be reasonable.[9]

What constitutes a proper tender must depend on all the circumstances of the particular case.[10]

§ 31. Prepayment of Charges

A common carrier may make prepayment of charges a condition precedent to furnishing transportation; but, if it does not, failure to tender payment in advance does not excuse refusal to transport.

A common carrier may make prepayment of freight charges a condition precedent to furnishing transportation.[11] Unless it requires prepayment, however, failure to tender such payment in advance will not be an excuse for refusing to transport.[12] A fortiori, if the bill of lading provides for payment of charges at the end of transportation, failure to tender such charges in advance will not be a defense for refusal to receive and to transport goods tendered for shipment.[13]

§ 32. Transportation to Points beyond Carrier's Line

A common carrier must carry on its own line freight destined to a point beyond; but it has no common-law duty, in the absence of a contract or a holding out of itself as assuming such duty, to carry freight beyond its own line.

A common carrier has no right to refuse to receive freight destined to a point beyond its own line, but must carry such freight to the end of its line,[14] and, as will be seen in § 410 infra, deliver it to a connecting carrier to be forwarded. Accordingly, a contract by one carrier with another that it will not receive goods destined to a point beyond its own line is illegal and cannot excuse its refusal to receive goods so destined.[15]

On the other hand, a common carrier has no duty at common law, in the absence of a contract to do so, to transport goods to a point beyond its own line,[16] or beyond the limits of the territory to which

Bill of lading

§ 33. Actions for Refusal to Receive and Transport

a. Nature and form
b. Venue
c. Parties
d. Pleading
e. Evidence
f. Questions for jury
g. Damages
h. New trial

a. Nature and Form

A common carrier's failure to receive and transport freight is a private wrong for which the shipper may recover damages at law.

The neglect or refusal of a common carrier to receive and transport freight tendered for shipment is a private wrong for which the shipper is entitled to recover, in an action at law, such damages as he has sustained;[19] and trespass has been held the proper form.[20]

b. Venue

If the complaint does not show the place of the carrier's refusal, the action is presumably in the proper county. For a change to the county of its principal place of business, the carrier must show that the breach occurred outside the county where action was brought.

If the place at which the common carrier's refusal to carry plaintiff's goods occurred does not appear in the complaint, the action is presumably brought in the proper county. To obtain a change of venue to the county where it has its principal place of business, the carrier must affirmatively show that the breach did not occur in the county in which the action was brought.[21]

c. Parties

The shipper is the proper party plaintiff. The lessor of a railroad line is not a necessary party defendant in an action against the lessee railroad.

The shipper, not the consignee, is the proper party to bring an action against a common carrier for wrongfully refusing to transport property.[22] The lessor of a railroad line is not a necessary party defendant in an action against the lessee railroad for refusal to receive and transport property over such line.[23]

d. Pleading

In an action for a carrier's failure or refusal to receive or transport property, various allegations have been held or held not required of plaintiff; and the carrier must affirmatively plead facts exonerating it from liability. The evidence must conform to the theory of the complaint.

In an action for a common carrier's failure or refusal to receive and transport property, the complaint or petition should allege plaintiff's capacity to sue, as that he is the consignor or owner of the property which the carrier neglected or refused to carry,[24] that defendant is a common carrier for through routes and rates has been held not to authorize such commission to order a carrier to issue a through bill of lading over a line with which the carrier had no direct physical connection—State Public Utilities Commission v. Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. R. Co., 125 N.E 495, 290 Ill. 580.

(3) A bill of lading showing the destination and the name of the consignee does not of itself bind a carrier to transport property beyond its own line.

Tex—Ft. Worth & R. G. Ry. Co. v. Jones, Civ.App., 212 S.W. 552.

Duty on branch line

A railroad is not necessarily under a duty to transport goods over a branch line operated by it under lease—Avinger v. South Carolina R. Co., 7 S.E. 493, 29 S.C. 265, 13 Am.S. R. 716.

Duty held not assumed

However, the fact that a carrier has on certain occasions transported cars from the point of shipment to a point beyond its line has been held insufficient to impose on it the duty of so doing.—Coles v. Central R., etc., Co., 12 S.E. 749, 86 Ga. 251.

hire,[25] that plaintiff requested defendant to carry his goods and was ready and willing to pay the customary freight charges,[26] that defendant neglected and refused to carry his goods,[27] and, apparently, the specific damages incurred by plaintiff as the result of defendant's refusal.[28]

On the other hand, it has been held unnecessary to allege a tender of the transportation charges,[29] at least if the carrier's refusal was for reasons other than nonpayment of such charges,[30] the point to which the property was destined, where such point was necessarily unascertained,[31] that the rate agreed on was that established by the railroad commission,[32] or that it was within the carrier's power to receive and transport the property with reasonable dispatch.[33]

Plea or answer. A common carrier must affirmatively plead any fact which will exonerate it from liability for refusing to receive and carry goods tendered to it for shipment.[34]

Variance. The evidence must correspond to the theory of the complaint; a party cannot declare on one theory and recover on another.[35]

e. Evidence

The carrier has the burden of proving facts exonerating it from liability. Evidence that the carrier quoted an incorrect rate has been held admissible, and, in a particular case, evidence has been held insufficient to show a tender to the carrier.

A common carrier has the burden of proving such facts as would exonerate it from liability for refusing to receive and transport property tendered to it for shipment.[36] Evidence that an interstate carrier quoted an incorrect rate has been held admissible in an action against it for refusal to transport property at the rate prescribed by the interstate commerce commission.[37] In particular cases, evidence has been held insufficient to show a tender of the property,[38] or any purpose to make such a tender to defendant as a carrier.[39]

f. Questions for Jury

Particular evidence has been held sufficient to go to the jury as to the wrapping, marking, or acceptance of goods, or the carrier's refusal to transport except at an excessive rate.

In particular cases, evidence has been held sufficient to go to the jury on the question whether the goods were tendered properly wrapped and marked, or were accepted by the carrier's agent,[40] or whether the carrier refused to transport them except at an excessive rate.[41]

g. Damages

A shipper may recover such damages as naturally and proximately result from a carrier's failure to receive and transport property; and losses and expenses resulting from delay in acceptance or incomplete performance may likewise be recovered. Exemplary damages may be allowed where willful disregard of the shipper's rights or gross negligence is shown.

The damages recoverable for a common carrier's wrongful failure or refusal to receive and to transport property are those which naturally and proximately flow from such failure or refusal.[42] Thus, the shipper may ordinarily recover the difference between the market value of the property at the point to which it was destined at the time it would have arrived had the carrier discharged its duty, and its market value at the same time at the point of shipment, less the cost of transportation.[43] Moreover, it has been held that a shipper may recover for an injury to his business at the point of destination resulting from the need for the property in such business,[44] or, under a statute allowing recovery of actual damages, for profits he would have realized under a contract with a third person but for the carrier's wrongful refusal to transport.[45]

Delay in acceptance. Where the carrier accepts the property for shipment after an improper delay, the measure of damages is the difference between the market value of the property at the point of destination at the time the property should have arrived and its market value at that point at the time it did arrive;[46] further, the carrier will be liable for any injury to, or deterioration in, the property resulting from the delay,[47] even though the deterioration results from something inherent in the nature of the goods,[48] and for expenses incurred by the shipper in caring for the property during the delay,[49] and in delivering it a second time for transportation.[50] Liability and actions for delay in transportation are considered generally in §§ 190–230 infra.

Incomplete performance. Where a carrier fails to complete performance of its duty to transport property, it is liable for the cost of transportation, above the proper charges, incurred by the shipper in completing performance.[51]

Exemplary damages may be given if the carrier's refusal is the result of ill-will or willful disregard of the rights of the person tendering the goods for transportation,[52] or if its breach of the statutory duty to transport is attended by circumstances warranting a finding of gross negligence.[53]

Damages for breach of special contract to transport see infra § 134.

Difference between correct and quoted rate

Where an interstate carrier quotes a higher rate than the regular interstate rate, forcing the shipper to forego shipment and sell his goods at a loss, the shipper's recovery is not confined to the mere difference between the correct and the quoted rate.—Aldrich v. Southern R. Co., 79 S.E 316, 95 S.C. 427.

Availability of similar goods as qualification

However, where goods of the type tendered by the shipper are necessary to his business at the point of destination, the rule of damages stated in the text is subject to the qualification that similar goods be obtainable at such point.—Pennsylvania R Co. v. Titusville & P. Plank Road Co., 71 Pa. 350.

44. Pa.—Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Titusville & P. Plank Road Co., supra.

Particular items of damage recoverable

(1) In such circumstances, the carrier has been held liable for "the natural consequences of delay and stoppage of work and payment of wages, and expenses arising therefrom, and the loss from not having the work finished at the time it otherwise would have been"—Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Titusville & P Plank Road Co, 71 Pa 350, 356.

(2) On the other hand, the shipper has been held not entitled to recover for loss to his business resulting from a rise of wages, stormy weather, or bad roads, since such loss was not a proximate effect of the carrier's failure to transport—Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Titusville & P. Plank Road Co., supra.

(3) Furthermore, it was held that the shipper must adopt every proper and feasible means of supplying himself with necessary goods, and that his neglect to do so was "an element for the consideration of the jury in estimating damages"—Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Titusville & P. Plank Road Co., supra.

h. New Trial

Grant of a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to law and unsupported by evidence is within the trial court's discretion.

The grant of a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to law and without evidence to support it is within the discretion of the trial court.[54]

§ 34. Injunction to Enjoin Refusal to Receive and Transport

A shipper may obtain a mandatory injunction enjoining a common carrier from wrongfully refusing to receive and transport his property, if an adequate legal remedy is lacking, but not if such injunction would inequitably expose the carrier to serious risk.

If the legal remedy is inadequate, a shipper may ordinarily obtain a mandatory injunction enjoining a common carrier from wrongfully refusing to receive and transport his property;[55] but such an injunction will not be granted in the absence of a showing that the legal remedy, as by an action at law for damages, is inadequate,[56] or where such injunction would inequitably expose the carrier to the risk of serious legal consequences.[57]

E. DUTY TO FURNISH CARS

§ 35. Statement of Rule

A common carrier must promptly furnish cars for the transportation of property of a shipper who has complied with conditions precedent, whenever it can do so with reasonable diligence and without jeopardizing its other business or discriminating against other shippers; but the duty is not absolute, the law requiring only what is reasonable. A carrier unable to furnish cars must give notice of such inability within a reasonable time after a request therefor.

As a corollary to the general rule stated in § 27 supra, that a common carrier has the duty to receive and transport property, it is well settled, both under and apart from statutes in effect so providing, that a common carrier is bound promptly to furnish cars for the transportation of property,[58] whenever it can do so by the exercise of

Discretion held properly exercised

A trial court's refusal to grant a carrier a new trial has been held to be a proper exercise of its discretion where plaintiff showed that the carrier transported goods of other parties engaged in the same business, who had applied for such transportation after plaintiff, and that plaintiff's goods depreciated in value owing to the failure to transport, although the carrier denied such facts and its evidence tended to show that it did not have the means to transport plaintiff's goods because of a pressure of general business on its road —Atlanta, etc., R Co. v. Holcombe, 76 Ga. 590.

Preliminary mandatory injunction

(1) A shipper is entitled to a preliminary mandatory injunction if threatened with serious and irreparable injury—Texas Pipe Line Co. v. Burton Drilling Co., Tex.Civ.App., 54 S.W.2d 190—10 C.J. p. 70 note 12 Apparently so holding, Crescent Liquor Co. v. Platt, C.C.W.Va., 148 F. 894.

Disobedience of statute

The exercise of judicial discretion in refusing to grant a mandatory injunction directing a railroad company to accept and transport cotton without attached bale tags required by statute has been held to have been properly influenced by the fact that the issuance of such writ would probably encourage persons situated similarly to plaintiff, but who would not be bound by the decree, to make demands similar to those made by plaintiff, compliance with which by defendant would, in the absence of a court order, inequitably expose defendant to the risk of serious punishment for disobeying a statute the validity of which it was not beneficially interested in championing—Moor v. Texas & N. O. R. Co., C.C.A. Tex., 75 F.2d 386, certiorari granted 55 S.Ct. 836, 295 U.S. 728, 79 L.Ed. 1678, appeal dismissed 56 S.Ct. 372, 297 U.S. 101, 80 L.Ed. 509.

The carrier must furnish, without unreasonable delay, sufficient cars to transport property of such quantity as is ordinarily, or may reasonably be expected to be, offered for shipment,[62] and of such character as it holds itself out as willing to carry.[63]

cars be furnished at a reasonable time[64] For failure to perform this duty, without lawful excuse, the carrier is liable to a shipper in damages for such injuries as he has sustained in consequence thereof.[65]

Duty not absolute. The carrier's duty to furnish cars for the transportation of property is not an absolute one, either at common law or under statutes prescribing its duty in that regard,[66] the law exacts from a common carrier only what is reasonable as regards furnishing cars.[67] It is not required to furnish means of transportation other than it owns and uses or holds out to the public on its own route for that purpose,[68] or to furnish cars at stations or points on its road other than those provided for the service of the public, or at which it is in the habit of accepting freight from any person offering it for transportation.[69]

In connection with the limitation on the carrier's duty should be considered excuses for failure to furnish cars and conditions precedent to a shipper's right to cars, considered in § 36 and § 37 respectively.

Notice as to ability to furnish cars. A common carrier must notify a shipper within a reasonable time if it is unable to furnish cars at the time and place requested.[70] If it fails to give such notice, and to obtain the shipper's consent, express or implied, to a delay,[71] or induces the shipper to believe, so that he presents his property for shipment at the time and place requested, that cars will be furnished as requested,[72] the carrier will be liable for any damages resulting from its failure to give such notice, unless there is no causal relation between the failure to give notice and the damages sustained.[73] However, a carrier is not liable for failure to notify a shipper that cars are available for an interstate shipment, since the giving of such notice would be a special service and unlawful.[74] nish cars resulting from circumstances not reasonably within its power to control, such as a shortage of cars caused by a sudden and unforeseeable demand, but in particular circumstances a shortage due to the carrier's own fault or which it could have prevented has been held not an excuse.

Under, or apart from, statutes in effect so providing, a common carrier's failure to furnish cars, or to furnish them promptly, is excused by all causes not reasonably within its power to prevent [75]

Shortage or want of cars. A carrier is not liable for failure to furnish cars where the failure results from a sudden and great demand for cars,[76] or from an abnormal, prolonged detention thereof on connecting lines,[77] which could not have been foreseen and against which the carrier could not reasonably have been expected to provide.

On the other hand, the fact that a carrier did not have sufficient cars to supply a demand does not excuse a failure to furnish cars resulting from negligence in not providing for the ordinary conduct of its business;[78] and it has been held that, where the carrier does not possess a reasonable equipment for all ordinary purposes, the fact that at the time of demand for cars the volume of business was such as could not have been foreseen will not constitute a defense for failure to furnish cars.[79] Further, it is not an excuse that the carrier does not own cars of the type requested, but is wholly dependent on another company for them, and that such company has failed to supply them,[80] especially where a car of the type requested has been commonly used by the carrier in transporting property of the kind tendered,[81] or the carrier, although it does not own cars by which the property can be shipped, accepts the property with notice of its character.[82] Likewise a car shortage resulting from the fact that a large number of the carrier's cars were in the hands of connecting carriers does not constitute a sufficient excuse in the absence of a showing that such circumstances were not the fault of the carrier.[83] So also a car shortage is not an excuse where the extraordinary demand occurred only on a division of the carrier's road and with ordinary care the carrier could have obtained cars from other parts of its system,[84] or where the shortage results from the carrier's own act of inducing large shipments,[85] or from an extension of the carrier's mileage and a natural increase in business,[86] or where the car-

Apportionment as discharge of duty

Reason for rule
A common carrier cannot excuse its failure to meet natural and normal traffic conditions by saying that it failed to anticipate them or to provide against them. That would rier promised the shipper that cars would be furnished, and failed to notify him at any time that it would be unable to furnish them.[87] Unreasonable delay is not excused by a car shortage where the carrier has served other shippers at nearby points more promptly.[88]

Governmental agency. The fact that the transportation of particular property was prohibited except on permission of a government inspector, which permission the shipper failed to obtain has been held to excuse a carrier's refusal to furnish cars for such property.[89] On the other hand, the fact that a carrier's tracks had been dangerously weakened by an excavation made by a municipality has been held not to constitute a sufficient excuse for failure to furnish cars, where it did not appear that the carrier could not have easily braced its tracks.[90]

Inclement weather. The fact that a carrier's servants abandoned the train because of cold weather was held not to constitute an excuse, in a particular climate, for failure to furnish cars.[91]

Strike. A strike has been held not to be an excuse where the shipper was not given timely notice that the carrier would be prevented from furnishing cars,[92] even if the shipper had knowledge of the existence of such strike.[93]

b. Other Excuses

Various circumstances in addition to those considered in the preceding subdivision have been adjudged available or unavailable as excuses for a common carrier's failure or refusal to furnish cars.

A carrier whose filed tariff contains no provision under which the property offered can be lawfully accepted is not bound to furnish cars.[94] Of course, a carrier is not liable for failure to furnish a car where the shipper's request therefor is canceled before the time for furnishing,[95] or where the car was requested from another company and the carrier had nothing to do with the transaction except to set out the car for the shipper.[96]

On the other hand, it has been held that a carrier cannot excuse its refusal to furnish car service on the ground that such action was necessary to prevent the shipper from violating the rates imposed by the carrier, which rates were themselves illegal,[97] or that the shipper refused to pay demurrage charges for the detention of cars, where such detention was occasioned as much by the carrier's fault as by the shipper's.[98] So also, where the carrier furnishes a car before the day requested, it is not entitled to remove the car on the day the car was to have been furnished, on the ground that the car was not loaded within the time allowed by its rules.[99]

a. Notice

A common carrier must be given reasonable notice of the number and kind of cars desired and the time and place at which they are to be furnished. Rule as to interstate shipments held applicable

In particular circumstances, a shipper who had failed to make a written order for cars was held not entitled to urge, for the purpose of avoiding the carrier's rule requiring been held that the requirement of written notice under such a rule may be waived,[11] it is more commonly held that a carrier's rule requiring written notice cannot be waived where such rule constitutes a part of the tariffs filed with the state railroad commission[12] or the interstate commerce commission;[13] but it has been held that a carrier may waive a statutory requirement as to written notice,[14] or a rule of the interstate commerce commission prescribing the form of a written notice.[15]

b. Tender of Property for Shipment

A shipper must have properly tendered property to be entitled to recover for failure to furnish cars, unless it appeared in advance that cars would not be furnished. A tender is sufficient if made in the manner usual for such property or held out by the carrier as sufficient.

A shipper must have made a proper tender of the property to be shipped in order to be entitled to recover from the common carrier for failure to furnish cars,[16] unless the shipper was informed, or it appeared, in advance that cars would not be furnished.[17] A tender is sufficient if made in the manner usual for such property,[18] or in a manner which the carrier holds out as being sufficient.[19]

c. Tender of Freight Charges

A shipper need not have tendered freight charges to be entitled to recover for failure to furnish cars, where the carrier did not demand payment.

A shipper need not have tendered the freight charges in order to be entitled to recover from the common carrier for failure to furnish cars within a reasonable time, where the carrier had made no demand for payment.[20]

d. Reasonable Time to Furnish Cars

In the absence of controlling statutory or contractual provision, a common carrier is entitled to a reasonable time to furnish cars after notice. What constitutes a reasonable time depends, in the absence of statute or a rule of the carrier, upon the particular circumstances.

In the absence of a statutory provision as to the time within which cars must be furnished,[21]

a. Nature and Form

A common carrier's failure to furnish cars within a reasonable time constitutes a breach of a duty created by law, not by contract; but it has been held immaterial, even in the case of interstate shipments, that the shipper predicated liability for damages on a breach of contract. Statutory remedies do not abrogate the common-law right of action.

A common carrier's failure to furnish cars within a reasonable time after demand constitutes a breach of a duty created by law, not by contract;[25] but it has been held that the form of an action for damages for failure to furnish cars on the day requested is unimportant, and that it is immaterial that the shipper may have predicated the carrier's liability on a breach of contract to furnish cars,[26] even where the cars were requested for an interstate shipment.[27] A shipper's common-law right of action for damages is not abrogated by the existence of various statutory remedies.[28]

ing that a carrier must furnish cars at the place of shipment within twenty four hours from 7 P.M. on the day following an application therefor, it was held that a carrier performed its duty by furnishing a car on the morning following the afternoon it was ordered.—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Statutes prescribing penalty
(1) Statutes prescribing a penalty for failure to furnish cars on reasonable notice do not abrogate the common-law right of action for damages.

(2) The reason for this rule has been said to be that: "It would require a very strong implication to show that the Legislature, in endeavoring to confer upon shippers an additional means of enforcing prompt furnishing of cars, absolutely excluded them from a resort to the courts for a recovery of damages . . . the act was intended to give an additional safeguard and remedy, which a shipper might adopt if he so desired, and not to destroy his right of action for damages."—Southern R. Co. v. Moore, 67 S.E. 85, 89, 133 Ga. 806, 815, 26 L.R.A., N.S., 851.

(3) However, it was held, in an action under a statute providing that the shipper could recover both a penalty and the actual damages suffered, that the shipper was not entitled to recover damages if the facts

b. Limitations

Under a statute so providing, an action for damages for refusal to furnish cars is barred if not brought within one year after the cause accrues.

Under a statute so providing, an action for damages for a common carrier's refusal to furnish a car on demand is barred if not brought within one year after the cause of action accrues.[29]

c. Jurisdiction

State and federal courts have concurrent jurisdiction of an action for failure to furnish cars for interstate shipment. That a carrier has a legal excuse for failure to furnish cars does not deprive courts of jurisdiction to hear and decide the issues.

Where the action is for failure to furnish cars for property destined for shipment in interstate commerce, the state and federal courts have concurrent jurisdiction,[30] and this is so irrespective of whether the action is treated as a suit for a breach of the carrier's common-law duty to furnish cars or an action for damages for the carrier's unjust discrimination in the allotment of cars.[31] The fact that a carrier has a legal excuse for failure to furnish cars does not deprive the courts of jurisdiction to hear and decide the issues upon the law and the facts.[32]

d. Defenses

Legal defenses may be interposed to an action for failure to furnish cars.

Legal defenses may be interposed to an action against a carrier for damages for failure to furnish cars.[33] It is not a defense that the shipper failed to give the carrier notice before removing injured property from a car;[34] nor is the fact that the shipper held the property for speculative purposes a bar to recovery.[35] The fact that after discovering that cars will not be furnished the shipper continues to haul property to the station does not constitute a defense, but cause only for denying redress to the extent that he increased the damage by accumulating property after such discovery.[36]

A shipper is not guilty of contributory negligence in simply having his property at the point of shipment at what is in fact a reasonable time after demanding cars.[37]

Where the carrier has failed to furnish cars and damages have accrued, the fact that the shipper and the carrier subsequently enter into a contract for the shipment of the freight does not in any way affect the shipper's right to recover the damages sustained.[38]

e. Parties

A factor who controlled the property, prepared it for shipment, and requested cars may maintain an action in his own name for failure to furnish cars. A shipper's employees cannot recover for loss of employment caused by a carrier's failure to furnish cars.

A factor who had the custody and control of property, prepared it for shipment, and requested cars for its transportation has such an interest in the property as entitles him to maintain an action in his own name against the carrier for failure to furnish cars.[39] On the other hand, a shipper's employees have been held not to have such an interest as will entitle them to maintain an action against a carrier for loss of employment resulting from the carrier's failure to furnish cars to the shipper.[40] essential to such cause of action, including proper demand for the cars and tender of the goods.

The declaration, petition, or complaint in an action for damages for failure to furnish cars must allege a timely demand by the shipper[41] for a certain number of cars to be furnished on a definite date,[42] that the demand was made on an agent authorized to furnish cars,[43] the time when the demand was made,[44] and, under a statute so requiring that the carrier was notified in writing of the market to which the property was to be shipped.[45]

Further the complaint must allege a tender of the goods[46] to a duly authorized agent of the carrier,[47] and, under a statute in effect requiring such a showing, that it was within the power of the carrier to furnish cars on the requested day.[48]

So also, it should be made to appear that the damages alleged were the proximate result of the carrier's failure to furnish cars,[49] and the facts from which the amount of damages may be estimated should likewise appear.[50]

Where the complaint alleges the character of the goods offered for shipment, it need not further allege the character of cars required, since the carrier will be presumed to know, in such circumstances, what kind is needed.[51]

In particular cases, complaints or petitions have been held to be sufficient,[52] at least after verdict,[53] to state a cause of action for failure to furnish cars, or to state a cause of action for a breach of the carrier's common-law or statutory duty rather than of a special agreement;[54] also, the pleadings have been held to raise the issue as to whether the carrier furnished cars within a reasonable time after demand,[55] and an allegation that it became necessary for the shipper to incur certain expenses in caring for his stock has been held to mean, in the absence of a special exception, that such expenses were reasonable.[56]

Amendment. Where the original petition alleges specific damage resulting from the carrier's failure to furnish cars on a written demand, an amendment alleging that the carrier was bound by an express contract to furnish cars does not add a new and distinct cause of action, and the amended petition is not demurrable.[57]

the carrier from liability for delay on account of strikes is properly stricken where such contract was not entered into until after the delay had occurred;[58] and an allegation that the shipper had knowledge that injunction proceedings had been instituted against a strike alleged to have caused the carrier's delay has been held immaterial.[59] On the other hand, a carrier's failure to comply with state rules of practice in pleading a defense that the shipper's order for cars for an interstate shipment was not in writing does not preclude the carrier from establishing such defense,[60] since the written order cannot be waived.[61]

g. Evidence

In actions for failure to furnish cars the general rules of evidence apply.

In an action for damages for failure to furnish cars, the burden is on the shipper to establish that the carrier owned and operated a railroad at the point at which cars were to be furnished,[62] and, under the federal rule, actual negligence on the carrier's part in delaying to furnish cars after demand.[63] On the other hand, the burden is on the carrier to establish the facts constituting an excuse for failure to furnish cars;[64] thus, a carrier claiming justification for a delay because of abnormal operative conditions, such as abnormally great demand for, or shortage of, cars has the burden of proving the existence of such conditions,[65] that such conditions could not reasonably have been anticipated and avoided,[66] and that they were the sole cause of the delay.[67]

Admissibility. In particular cases, evidence has been held admissible, for the purpose of rebutting a carrier's defense that its failure to furnish cars was caused by an unprecedented demand, to show that the carrier had assured the shipper, prior to the latter's demand for cars, that it would furnish sufficient cars for shippers in the particular area,[68] that in preceding seasons there had been a car shortage on the carrier's line in that area,[69] and that shippers who ordered cars after plaintiff received cars before plaintiff did.[70] Evidence of the number of cars which the carrier had on the lines of connecting carriers is inadmissible where the carrier makes no claim of a car shortage.[71] Under an answer alleging that the carrier was prevented from furnishing cars by causes which it could not have avoided by the exercise of reasonable diligence, evidence is admissible that there was a car shortage and that cars were distributed under rules adopted while railroads were under governmental control.[72]

A witness' lump estimate of the total damage, without indication of the items entering into such estimate, has been held not competent evidence.[73]

Reason for decision

Such an estimate was incompetent "for the reason that it was impossible for the jury to separate the items of damage which, under the instructions of the court, could be considered the proximate result of defendant's alleged breach of duty, and for which it might be liable, from those items of alleged damage which, under the instruction of the court, would be too remote to enter into the verdict."—Mauldin v. Sea-

Evidence as to the effect of the carrier's failure to furnish cars upon the expense of maintaining and conducting the shipper's business has been held admissible for the purpose of arriving at the shipper's net profit, as affecting damages;[74] but evidence as to the state of the market at the point of destination on the day cars were to have been furnished is irrelevant where the property could not have arrived at such point on the same day it was to have been shipped.[75] A carrier's rule, filed with the state railroad commission, requiring orders for cars to be given or confirmed in writing is admissible in evidence.[76]

Weight and sufficiency. In particular cases, evidence has been held sufficient to support findings that a carrier's failure or delay in furnishing cars was without sufficient excuse,[77] or was negligent,[78] or not negligent,[79] that the carrier did not furnish cars within a reasonable time;[80] that its delay in furnishing cars was not the result of demands which it could not reasonably have anticipated and met;[81] that it had not prepared itself to meet an increased demand[82] of which it had notice,[83] that the shipper's demand for cars was made on an agent of the carrier having apparent authority to receive such demand;[84] that the shipper had on hand at the time cars were to be furnished a sufficient quantity of property to fill the cars;[85] that the shipper had no knowledge of a shortage of cars at the time he tendered the property;[86] that the value of the property decreased a particular amount because the shipper was obliged, on the carrier's failure to furnish cars, to ship the property by a less desirable method;[87] and that the shipper suffered damage in a particular amount because of the carrier's delay.[88]

On the other hand, evidence has been held insufficient, in particular cases, to show that the carrier owned or operated a railroad at the point at which cars were to be furnished,[89] to support a finding that the carrier could have furnished cars by the exercise of reasonable diligence,[90] and to permit of a determination of the correct measure of damages to be applied in the circumstances.[91]

h. Trial

In actions for failure or refusal to furnish cars, various questions, including that of whether delay in furnishing cars was reasonable, have been held to be for the jury; and in particular cases the sufficiency of evidence to go to the jury, and the propriety of instructions, have been determined.

It is a question of fact or for the jury whether a carrier was properly equipped to supply normal demands for cars,[92] whether there was an abnormally great and unforeseen demand for or shortage of, cars,[93] or the demand for cars was such as could not reasonably have been anticipated and supplied by the exercise of ordinary care,[94] or whether the carrier's delay in furnishing cars was reasonable in the circumstances.[95] However, there is authority holding that the question of a reasonable time for furnishing cars is a mixed one of law and fact,[96] and, of course, uncontroverted evidence as to a carrier's inability to furnish cars by the exercise of reasonable diligence presents no question for the jury, but is for the court.[97]

In particular cases, evidence has been held sufficient to go to the jury on the questions whether the shipper ordered a particular number of cars of a particular type for loading at a particular time,[98] whether the carrier failed to meet normal demands for cars,[99] and whether the demand for cars was such as could not reasonably have been anticipated and supplied by the exercise of ordinary care;[1] and in particular circumstances the trial court has been held not justified in ruling, as a matter of law, that the carrier was without fault in delaying to furnish cars.[2] On the other hand, evidence in a particular case has been held insufficient to go to the jury on the question whether a shortage of cars was caused by a demand which could not have been anticipated and supplied,[3] and, in an action based upon a negligent and unreasonable failure to furnish a car after notice, evidence that a car was not furnished until a certain number of days after it was ordered is insufficient to take the case to the jury in the absence of evidence tending to show that such a delay was negligence.[4]

Instructions. A requested instruction as to the invalidity of a special contract is properly refused where the action is for a breach of the carrier's common-law duty to furnish cars;[5] and where the jury is charged as to a carrier's duty generally, it is not error for the trial court not to repeat in other portions of its charge as to the carrier's duty a statement as to its duty to transport all property it is able and accustomed to carry.[6] An instruction that the carrier is liable if it unreasonably delayed in furnishing cars is sufficient to include a defense, and evidence in support thereof, that the delay was caused by a strike.[7] An instruction stating the measure of damages in terms of the price for which the shipper could reasonably have sold the property, rather than its market value, is inaccurate, but not prejudicial,[8] but an instruction authorizing a recovery not exceeding a particular amount is prejudicially erroneous where there was no evidence supporting a finding for that amount.[9] An instruction that the jury should determine whether the carrier failed, without lawful excuse, to furnish a car in a reasonable time is prejudicially inadequate if it does not instruct the jury as to how it should determine whether the delay was unreasonable,[10] and an instruction that the carrier would not be relieved of liability if it failed to notify the shipper, at the time a car was ordered, of its inability to furnish cars because of a strike was held to be prejudicially erroneous in view of the undisputed evidence.[11]

Direction of verdict. A common carrier is not entitled to a directed verdict on the claimed ground that its delay in furnishing cars was excused, where it fails to show that its distribution of cars was not discriminatory, or did not cause the delay.[12]

its common-law or statutory duty to furnish cars within a reasonable time after demand, the carrier is liable for such damages as were the proximate result of its breach of duty and were within the contemplation of the parties.

In actions based on a breach of a carrier's common-law or statutory duty to furnish cars, the carrier is liable to the shipper for such damages as were sustained because of the carrier's failure or default in delivering cars as requested.[13] Thus, where, on failure of the carrier to furnish cars within a reasonable time after demand, the shipper elects to treat the carrier's obligation to furnish cars as at an end, the shipper is entitled to recover the difference between the market value of the goods at the destination to which they were to be carried, at the time they would have arrived had the carrier furnished cars within a reasonable time, and their market value at the same time at the place from which they were to be shipped, less the freight,[14] also, the shipper may recover the additional expense of transporting the property by a different means.[15]

On the other hand, where the carrier transported the property after an unreasonable delay in furnishing cars, the weight of authority is that the shipper is entitled to recover the difference between the market value of the property at the point of destination at the time the property should have arrived and its market value at that point at the time it did arrive.[16] Under other authority, however, the measure of damages for a carrier's failure to furnish cars within a reasonable time is the difference between the market value of the property at the point of shipment at the time the cars should have been furnished and the market value at that point at the time cars were furnished.[17] The shipper is also entitled to recover expenses incurred by him because of the delay,[18] provided such expenses were reasonable.[19]

Effect of favorable later market

The fact that a shipper could have secured cars in subsequent months, and that the market was as good at that time as when cars were demanded and refused does not limit his recovery to nominal damages, since a shipper is not required "to await the turn of the market to find out whether the railroad company had injured him by failing to furnish cars."—St. Louis Southwestern R. Market value elsewhere not controlling

The measure of damages for a carrier's delay in furnishing cars depends upon the market value of the property at the destination contemplated by the parties at the time of shipment, rather than at the place to which the property was actually shipped.—Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Shipman, Tex.Civ.App., 98 S.W. 449.

Increase in freight rates and new tax

A shipper may recover for a decline in the market price of wheat resulting from an increase in freight rates and the levy of a war tax subsequent to the time the wheat would have been shipped had cars been furnished within a reasonable time.—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Effect of stoppage in transit by shipper's order

Reasonable expense of holding property

(1) The shipper is entitled to recover the reasonable expense of holding the property during the carrier's

j. Attorney's Fees

A statute allowing an attorney's fee to a shipper who successfully sues a railroad for not furnishing cars, but not to a railroad which successfully sues a shipper for not using cars, is unconstitutional.

A statute allowing an attorney's fee to a shipper who successfully sues a railroad company for failure to furnish cars, but making no such allowance to a railroad company in a successful action under such statute by the company against the shipper for failure to use cars, has been held unconstitutional.[22]

§ 39. Injunction to Compel Carrier to Furnish Cars

A mandatory injunction may be granted a shipper to compel a carrier to furnish him cars.

A mandatory injunction may be granted a shipper to compel a carrier to furnish him cars,[23] the fact that he has an action for damages for the carrier's refusal to furnish cars constitutes no ground for denial of an injunction.[24]

F. DUTIES INCIDENT TO TRANSPORTATION GENERALLY

§ 40. In General

A common carrier of goods has the duty to furnish reasonable and necessary facilities for the transportation of the volume of freight reasonably to be anticipated, and to use the care requisite for safe carriage; but it is not required to provide facilities at places other than at which they are customarily to be found. Corresponding to its duty, the carrier has the right exclusively to furnish the services and facilities required of it.

The duties and obligations imposed by law on a common carrier follow as a matter of course from the acceptance of goods for transport.[25] It is the duty of the carrier to provide and furnish all reasonable and necessary facilities for the prompt, safe, and efficient transportation of such goods as it holds itself out to the public as engaged in carrying,[26] and for, as hereinafter discussed in this section,

Loss under contract with third person

(1) It has been held that a contract between the shipper and a third person cannot be the basis of a recovery from the carrier for failure or delay in furnishing cars where the carrier had no notice of such contract—Davis v. McKinley, 255 S.W. 523, 200 Ky. 699.

(2) Likewise, the shipper cannot recover the expense of transporting the property by another means for the purpose of minimizing the loss under such contract, but only the difference between such expense and what it would have cost to have had the property transported by the carrier.—Davis v. McKinley, supra.

(3) However, there is authority holding that a shipper may recover for the loss of profits under such a contract even though the carrier had no knowledge of the contract.—Houston, etc., R. Co. v. such quantities as might reasonably and ordinarily be expected to be offered for carriage. It also has the duty safely to carry such goods,[27] and to this end, to exercise such care as is required to protect them from loss or injury during transportation.[28] The duty to furnish proper facilities for transportation similarly applies to carriers of live stock,[29] although ordinarily, a carrier of such freight does not have the same responsibilities which attend it as a carrier of goods.[30]

The carrier's duty in respect to necessary facilities is imposed by the common law and is in no sense dependent on statute,[31] although, as is already shown in § 19, the matter of furnishing reasonable facilities is very largely regulated by legislation on the subject or by rules formulated and promulgated by railroad commissions to whom the power of regulation has been delegated. If a carrier can otherwise lawfully be required to provide a service prescribed by a railroad commission, such obligation cannot be avoided merely because it is attended with considerable expense.[32]

In determining whether the carrier has fulfilled its obligation to provide adequate facilities, the test is one of reasonable diligence;[33] and its business as a whole, the character of the service required, the need of its performance, and the various rights of the public and of the carrier should in this respect be considered.[34] It is expected to be prepared with the equipment necessary to handle the average traffic offered it, and also such an increase as would be expected by a manager of experience, inasmuch as the volume of traffic will vary with the seasons and general business conditions, and the law requires that there be provision for these contingencies.[35] The rule, as otherwise ex-

Transportation of coal

(1) General rule respecting obligation of railroad, whether short line or trunk line, to furnish equipment for transporting freight tendered to it, applies to coal loaded at coal mines as well as to other traffic—Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. U. S., Ill., 52 S.Ct. 87, 284 U.S. 80, 76 L.Ed. 177.

Carriers of coal

(1) It has been held that a carrier of coal must have facilities sufficient to meet the normal demands of the trade during the periods of the year when the normal demand is heaviest.—Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. River, etc., Coal, etc., Co., 150 S.W.

pressed is that a carrier is not required to provide facilities to meet an unexpected and unprecedented rush of business, or unusual and extraordinary contingencies, which ordinary prudence or foresight could not anticipate,[36] but is bound only to provide facilities for such transportation as might reasonably be anticipated.[37]

The carrier is not required to furnish facilities to shippers other than at the places where they are customarily to be found.[38] Also, the carrier owes no duty to spot cars solely at the shipper's convenience, nor does a published switching tariff obligate it to conduct interplant movements of cars to the sole end of efficient operation of the plant.[39]

Where articles of an extraordinary character are offered, the carrier is not bound to provide facilities of a different kind from those usually furnished for transportation.[40]

Correlative right of carrier to furnish facilities. Where the law imposes on carriers the duty of furnishing specified services or facilities, it is vested with the corresponding right to furnish such services and facilities and to charge therefor.[41] This, it has been said, is an economic necessity due to the fact that the carrier cannot be expected to prepare to meet the demand and then let the use of its plants depend on haphazard calls under which the services for which the plants were built can be demanded by all shippers at one time and by only a few at another.[42]

Loading to capacity. The shipper has the right to insist that a truck hired to haul his goods be loaded to its fullest capacity, whether the hauling is to be paid for by the hour or by the load; but he cannot compel the carrier to overload the truck.[43]

Particular freight to be moved first. The shipper has a right to dictate the particular freight first to be moved.[44]

Reimbursement of shipper for providing equipment. A shipper who has furnished necessary equipment which it is the duty of the carrier to furnish, is entitled to be reimbursed therefor, irrespective of the fact that the carrier is insolvent or has been rendering the service at a loss.[45]

Special tracks not dedicated to public use. A carrier is not obliged to transport goods for the general public over a special track which by its rule and usage is reserved for its own use and the services of the industries located thereon; and its use of the track for other purposes in exceptional cases does not constitute a dedication for public use.[46]

§ 41. Duty to Furnish Suitable Facilities for Receiving and Delivering Goods

The duty of a carrier to furnish suitable facilities for handling inanimate freight will be discussed in § 42, for handling live stock in § 43. The duty of connecting carriers to furnish such facilities is treated in § 420 infra.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 42. Inanimate Freight

A carrier must furnish adequate freight houses for receiving and delivering freight.

Adequate freight houses or depots for receiving freight for shipment or for holding it for delivery must be provided by the carrier.[47]

(2) According to other authority the carrier is not required to provide facilities sufficiently extensive for maximum freight output at any time of the year, but is only required to meet a demand so adjusted as to utilize the equipment with regularity throughout the year—Montana, etc., R. § 43. Live Stock Pens and Yards

a. In general
b. Nature and character of facilities required
c. Carrier's or shipper's knowledge of defects

a. In General

A carrier is under the duty to provide reasonably sufficient facilities for receiving and delivering live stock accepted for transportation, and it will be liable for loss resulting from failure to maintain such facilities in a safe condition, notwithstanding that the shipper remains in control of the stock, or that a contract exonerates it from the duty of inspection of the facilities provided.

It is the duty of a carrier of live stock, as an incident to the business of transporting such stock, to furnish suitable pens, yards and other facilities for receiving and delivering the stock,[48] sufficient in number and size to take care of the shipments which are usually made or which may be reasonably anticipated;[49] and it will be liable for loss or injury resulting from nonperformance of its duty to keep such facilities in a reasonably safe condition for the purposes intended,[50] notwithstanding that the shipficient tracks, switches, sidings, yards, depots, and other facilities for receiving and delivering freight, the duty to provide such facilities is absolute.—Sugarland Industries v. Universal Mills, Tex.Civ.App., 275 S.W. 406.

Facilities on international bridge

A domestic railroad company cannot, however, be required to build an inclosure for the transfer of freight at the center of an international bridge owned half by it and half by a foreign company.—Texas-Mexican Ry. Co. v. State, Tex.Civ.App., 174 S.W. 298.

Analogous to inanimate freight

(3) Duty to provide safe facilities for inanimate freight see § 42 supra.

Before loading

The duty of a carrier of live stock, it is said, cannot be efficiently discharged without the aid of pens or yards in which the live stock offered for shipment can be received and handled, with safety and without inconvenience to the public, before being loaded in the cars in which they are to be transported.—Booke & Olson v. Payne, 184 N.W. 803, 48 N.D. 435—10 C.J. p 79 note 54.

"In the case of live stock destined to a town or city the carrier must furnish yards in which to receive the stock with safety, and so situated as to be convenient to the public and as to enable the carrier to promptly deliver the stock to the consignee. It is not required to own and operate such yards itself but may delegate that duty to another."—Bosworth v. Wabash Ry. Co., 58 S.W.2d 448, 332 Mo. 277, affirming Bosworth v. Wabash Ry. Co., App., 21 S.W.2d 1110—Burton v. Wabash Ry. Co., Mo.App., 22 S.W.2d 201, 204, affirmed 58 S.W.2d 443, 332 Mo. 268.

Pens used jointly with connecting carrier

10 C.J. p 79 note 51.

Unqualified duty

The duty of a carrier to furnish stockyards reasonably secure is unqualified.—Houchtelin v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 202 P. 571, 34 Idaho 482.

No duty rests on the shipper to repair the gates and pens and put them into condition for holding cattle, and he has the right to presume that the carrier will discharge this duty.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Andrews, Tex.Civ.App., 278 S.W. 478.

Loss occurring on line of another carrier

Where the carrier fails to provide safe and suitable pens, it is liable for loss or injury caused thereby, although the loss or injury occurs on the line of another carrier.—Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Harman, 22 S.E. 490, 91 Va. 601, 50 Am.S.R. 855, 44 L.R.A. 289.

In transit or awaiting shipment

(1) A carrier which has provided at a station the yard facilities for the loading and unloading of shipments must use reasonable care to keep its facilities in such condition and so equipped that animals awaiting shipment may receive proper care and attention during a reasonable time prior to loading.—Zakrzewski v. Great Northern R. Co., 154 N.W. 966, 131 Minn. 175—Zakrzewski v. Great Northern R. Co., 145 N.W. 801, 125 Minn. 125.

(2) The duty to maintain suitable facilities in a proper state of repair applies whether such facilities are to be used for the purpose of feeding, watering, and resting live stock while being transported over its road or are furnished for the reception of live stock intended for shipment.—Houchtelin v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 202 P. 571, 34 Idaho 482.

per in fact retains the control and management of the stock until loading is commenced.[51] This duty extends to the provision of safe yards and pens both at the point of shipment and at the point of destination.[52] It does not exist prior to the tender of the stock to the carrier for shipment,[53] but commences when the stock is delivered into its pens.[54] The duty is one imposed by law and it is in no way dependent on any condition of the shipping contract;[55] moreover, it has been held that the duty resting on the carrier of inspection of inclosures cannot be imposed on the shipper by contract, and any provision to that effect in a contract of shipment is void.[56]

However, a carrier, in providing pens, is only required to have such a number of pens as, according to the business of the carrier, is sufficient for the ordinary and usual volume of business,[57] and the business of other carriers there is immaterial.[58] Further, the carrier is not made an absolute insurer of live stock in transit, but its duty is fully performed by providing pens properly equipped.[59] The true test, it is said, is whether, under all the circumstances, the pens were such as a person of ordinary prudence would have provided.[60]

b. Nature and Character of Facilities Required

Pens must be provided with proper appliances for feeding, watering, and resting live stock and they must be so constructed as to prevent escape and to keep the stock secure from attack by outside animals; further, the pens must be kept reasonably clean, dry and free from noxious substances, and the carrier will be liable for loss resulting from placing animals in pens known to be infected.

In accordance with the rule stated in this section, subdivision a supra, requiring the carrier to furnish safe facilities for the care of live stock, the carrier is liable for injuries to animals resulting from defective chutes leading from the pens.[61] The pens must be provided with necessary equipment for feeding, watering, and sheltering the stock, such as proper racks, mangers, and troughs,[62] although, in the absence of statutory provision, a railroad company is not required to furnish feed or water to live stock in its pens awaiting shipment, unless the company has accepted the care and control thereof.[63] Further, pens must be constructed and maintained in such a state of efficiency as is reasonably calculated to prevent animals escaping therefrom, and a failure to fulfill its duty in this regard will render the carrier liable for loss or injury sustained thereby.[64] If surrounding conditions are such that injury to the stock confined in pens, from dogs or wild animals, might be expected, reasonable provisions for their safety must be made.[65] The pens should be kept reasonably clean and dry,[66] so that the animals should not be compelled to stand

(1) Whether the stockyards furnished are reasonably secure for sheep should be determined in view of the well-known fact that every city or village contains dogs, some of which are likely to attack sheep in pens, if opportunity is afforded.—Houchtelin v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 202 P. 571, 34 Idaho 482.

(2) On the other hand, it has been held that the carrier is not bound to guard against the possibility of danger from dogs in the absence of the known existence of vicious animals in the vicinity.—Beckman v. Southern Pac. Co., 118 P. 118, 39 Utah 472.

or lie in mud.[67] If the carrier permits salt water to stand in pens accessible to lambs offered for shipment, it is guilty of negligence and liable for loss occasioned thereby.[68] The carrier will be liable for loss or injury caused by unloading live stock into infected pens from which the stock contract disease,[69] if the infected condition existed and the carrier knew or had notice of it before the stock were received,[70] and it makes no difference as respects the carrier's liability that putting the stock in the infected pen was the only means which the carrier had of avoiding a violation of the Twenty-Eight-Hour Law.[71] The fact that they were unloaded in violation of the regulations of the United States department of agriculture will not defeat a recovery.[72] It is also immaterial that the loss did not occur until after delivery.[73] On the other hand, it has been held that where rules of the state department of agriculture declared public pens or yards to be infected, the removal of live stock from the yards by the shipper without disinfecting them constitutes contributory negligence precluding recovery against the carrier.[74]

c. Carrier's or Shipper's Knowledge of Defects

Notice of the defective condition of its facilities is not essential to the liability of the carrier; and, knowledge of such condition and use of the pens by the shipper does not constitute contributory negligence barring liability, although such may be the result if the pens are so obviously unsafe as to make injury certain or if the shipper should have undertaken to remedy the defect or if he himself negligently penned the animals.

As affects the liability of a carrier for injuries to live stock due to defective pens, it is of no importance that the carrier had received no notice that the pens were insufficient.[75] The shipper has the right to presume that the carrier will discharge its duty to keep pens in a suitable condition,[76] and mere knowledge on his part that the pens are defective will not relieve the carrier of liability;[77] nor will the use of defective pens by the shipper constitute contributory negligence absolving the carrier from liability, unless the pens are so obviously unsafe as to make it reasonably certain that injury to the animals must inevitably result.[78] It has been held, however, that if the shipper himself undertakes to pen his animals and fastens the gate so insecurely that the cattle escape, the carrier is not liable for loss or injury sustained thereby.[79] It has also been held that where the shipper could have prevented the escape of the animals by guarding or closing up a hole in the pen of which he had knowledge, his negligence is the proximate cause of the loss and he cannot recover against the carrier;[80] but the obligation of the shipper to discover defects in the yards furnished requires at most the exercise of ordinary care on his part.[81]

§ 44. Duty to Follow Shipping Directions

A carrier is under the obligation to follow specific shipping instructions to which it assents, whether there is an express contract to that effect or otherwise, and if such instructions are not clear, it must hold the goods until further directions are received. A carrier having an option as to the mode of shipment must exercise it for the best interests of the shipper.

Where goods are tendered to a carrier for transportation with specific shipping directions from the consignor, to which it assents, it assumes the obligation to follow such directions and is liable for loss or injury resulting from its failure to do so, and this is true whether there is or is not an express contract to follow such directions evidenced by bill of lading or otherwise.[82] Accordingly, in

Where plaintiff, without informing defendant's agent, and without feeding the cattle, put them in a yard properly fenced, but failed to put up all the gate bars, and left no one to guard the cattle, and the cattle broke through the gate, and some were killed by defendant's train, it was held that plaintiff, being a mere invitee, defendant was under no obligation to guard the cattle and was guilty of no negligence. addition to its duty to follow routing directions, treated in § 45 infra, the carrier, under the circumstances mentioned, is bound to transport goods in the particular manner and position directed,[83] and to use reasonable care to follow the shipping directions as to the place of destination.[84] It is also liable for loss or injury resulting from failure to follow shipping instructions and erroneously marking a shipment as deliverable only on the payment of the price.[85] On the other hand, if loss or injury occurs as a result of following the shipping directions, the carrier of course is not liable.[86]

Where shipping instructions are not clear, or where there is an obvious error in the directions given by the shipper as to the destination of the freight, it is the duty of the carrier to hold the goods, except in cases of emergency, and ask further instructions from the shipper.[87]

Optional mode of shipment. If the contract gives the carrier an option as to the mode of shipment, it is its duty to exercise it for the best interests of the shipper, and it is a breach of the contract to exercise it to his disadvantage unless in good faith and under circumstances which seem to require it.[88]

§ 45. Routing

a. In general
b. In absence of directions by shipper

a. In General

In the absence of circumstances justifying a deviation, it is the carrier's duty to obey the shipper's routing directions, although it cannot be compelled to use one of two equally desirable routes if the shipper has no reason for such demand; where the designated route is impracticable the carrier is not obliged to use another route but it should give the shipper notice of possible delays. A carrier's contractual option as to routing must be exercised reasonably.

The shipper on delivering property to a carrier for shipment has the right to designate the route by which it shall be transported, at least under a statute to that effect.[89] If specific directions as to the routing of the goods to be shipped are given,

Measure of damages recoverable

(1) Where the carrier knew that plaintiff was a wholesale dealer in coffee, and by reason of the indorsed value knew the selling price, it was charged with knowledge that plaintiff usually made a profit in business, and the item of profit was properly recoverable against it.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Bean, Tex.Civ.App., 233 S.W. 561.

(2) But in the absence of a showing of notice to defendant at the time of the making of the contract, or of the negligent act or omission, that the loss of business, patronage, and good will was to be expected from the negligent act, damages on this count will not be sustained.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Bean, supra.

(3) Where the manager of plaintiff's customer, the consignee, testified that he quit trading with plaintiff because of plaintiff's competition with him in sale of goods to cafés, the evidence does not support a finding of loss of business, patronage, and good will on account of the negligence of defendant.—American Ry. Higher freight rate

If the carrier adopts a mode of transportation which involves the payment of a higher rate of freight rather than a lower, it may show that it asked for and obtain direction from the shipper or consignee to employ the more expensive mode, or that, because of its inability to procure the means of shipment by the cheaper method, it was reasonably necessary in view of the exigencies of the particular case.—Stewart v. Comer, 28 S.E. 461, 100 Ga. 754, 62 Am.S.R. 353.

it is the duty of the carrier to obey these directions, and ordinarily, it will be liable for any injuries directly resulting from a nonobservance thereof,[90] especially where a greater freight charge than the lawful charge agreed on will be incurred if a different route is employed,[91] unless, as indicated herein, a deviation is justified by intervening circumstances. Where the carrier refuses to route as demanded by the shipper, there is a failure to perform a duty to the shipper imposed by law and a completed legal wrong is then done.[92] This duty to observe routing directions, it is said, arises at the time when the goods are offered and is imposed on the railroad company independently of any contract,[93] but until a proper tender of the goods has been made the duty does not arise.[94]

Change of route

Consignor's change of routing was held effective although bill of lading was not surrendered for indorsement in accordance with reconsignment tariff providing that original bill of lading "should" be surrendered, word "should" being merely directory.—Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Consolidated Companies, 156 So. 215, 180 La. 180, affirming, App., 151 So. 433.

Damages

(1) Where the contract of transportation provided for delivery of cattle to Chicago by way of Kansas City, the shipper having the privilege to sell the cattle at Kansas City, the shipper can recover in an action against the carrier for failing to permit a stop-off at Kansas City, the loss resulting from a forced sale on the Chicago market.—Bailey v. St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co., Mo. App., 290 S.W. 630.

(2) Where shipper ordered routing over certain lines with a certain railroad as the last carrier, and the goods were routed so that they arrived over a different railroad, and shipper filed claim two months after shipment, and two months after filing claim goods were found, and shipper ordered them sent to another destination over a route specified by him, and they were so sent and lost, the initial carrier is not liable for a conversion of the goods because of the misrouting and delay, being only liable for damages caused by the misrouting and damages sustained by reason of reshipment—Harrill v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., 103 S.E. 21, 179 N.C. 540.

(3) Other examples see 10 C.J. p 82 note 91 [c].

Delay after arrival

Initial carrier which failed to observe routing was liable for damages resulting from delayed delivery, irrespective of whether arrival notice was sent consignee within reasonable time or whether consignee used reasonable diligence—Levin v. International-Great Northern R. Co., Tex Civ.App., 45 S.W.2d 435, error dismissed.

No deviation

(1) Provision of receipt requiring carrier to transport freight only over its own lines was not violated by carrier in hiring a truck and chauffeur, according to its usual custom for transporting merchandise received from its customers—John H. Goetze & Co. v. Beam's Own, Inc, 199 N.Y.S. 790.

(2) In the absence of specific instructions to the contrary, a route named in a shipping receipt or bill of lading requires not only a terminal delivery by the carrier named but includes also a line haul in intermediate routing by such carrier—Davis v. Kehota Mining Co, 86 Pa Super. 443.

Shipment of corpse

Where a railroad at the time of selling a corpse ticket and tickets to relatives of deceased understood that the corpse was to be transported on the same train and over the same route as called for by the tickets sold to the relatives of deceased, its removal of the corpse from the train and transportation over different route was a violation of its contract for which each of the relatives could sue individually.—Lancaster v. Mebane, Tex.Civ App., 260 S. W. 252.

Sufficiency of direction

(1) Where bill of lading specified legal rate of a certain amount, and there was only one route over which shipment could be made at such rate, carrier was sufficiently apprised of the route desired by the shipper—Ex parte Louisville & N. R. Co, 79 So. 139, 201 Ala. 667, reversing Oden-Elliott Lumber Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 77 So. 240, 16 Ala.App. 251.

(2) A shipper's written instruction to a station agent as to the selection of a connecting carrier is superseded by subsequent bills of lading containing no provision on the subject—Bessling v. Houston, etc., R. Co, 80 S.W. 639, 35 Tex Civ.App. 470.

(3) Other examples.—10 C.J. p 82 note 91 [d] [e].

Waiver of objection

Where plaintiff has accepted and paid the freight at destination on several cars of watermelons consigned to him, he cannot afterward maintain an action of conversion against the initial carrier for misrouting them.—Shafton Co. v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 174 Ill.App. 121.

91. Ala.—Ex parte Louisville & N. R. Co., 79 So. 139, 201 Ala. 667, reversing Oden-Elliott Lumber Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 77 So. 240, 16 Ala App. 251.

92. Tex.—St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. True, Civ.App., 140 S.W. 837.

Effect of subsequent contract

(1) It has been held in view of the rule stated in the text, that where the carrier refuses to route a consignment as requested by the shipper, the shipper is entitled to recover any damages proximately resulting from such refusal, notwithstanding any shipping contracts subsequently entered into whereby the shipper agrees to employ another route.—St Louis, etc., R. Co. v. True, Tex Civ.App., 140 S.W. 837.

(2) It has been held, however, that where the shipper makes a binding contract for a through shipment over a designated route, he is not entitled to recover damages by reason of that route being longer than another route which he had demanded, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation, by the carrier or its agent, as to its inability to employ the route originally requested—Houston, etc, R Co. v. Buchanan, 94 S.W. 199, 42 Tex Civ.App. 620—10 C.J. p 83 note 99.

93. Tex.—St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. True, Civ.App., 140 S.W. 837—Inman v St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 37 S.W. 37, 14 Tex.Civ.App. 39.

94. Tex.—St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. True, Civ.App., 140 S.W. 837.
10 C.J. p 83 note 94.

Notwithstanding the rule just stated, it has been held that when goods are tendered for shipment to a point beyond the carrier's line, and there are two or more routes equally safe, prompt, and reliable, the carrier cannot be compelled to accept the goods to be carried over one route in preference to another, at the option of the shipper, unless some reason appears therefor; especially when the carrier shows that, in the conduct of its business, the use of one route may be advantageous to it without injury or sacrifice to the interests of the shipper.[95] It has also been held that, where a shipper of live stock was informed before the stock was loaded that there could be no through billing to the point of destination other than by a particular route, he could not select a different route and exact a through billing, when the carrier was not prepared to give it, and the shipper had been informed of that fact.[96] It seems also that the carrier may be justified in deviating from the shipper's instructions as to routing where the designated route becomes impracticable or incapable of use because of various intervening circumstances, such as floods,[97] an embargo,[98] the necessity for preservation of perishable goods,[99] the irresponsibility of the designated delivery company,[1] or the impossibility of transportation to destination by the designated connecting carrier.[2] However, where a definite route is specified, the carrier is not bound to forward by a different route, in the case that transportation by the designated route becomes impracticable,[3] although it is its duty in such a case to notify the shipper of the attendant circumstances and to await his further instructions.[4]

It has been held that, if the exercise of the shipper's right to route his goods over particular connecting lines would probably cause delays detrimental to the shipper and carrier, it is the carrier's duty to notify the shipper of this fact, and to allow him to choose whether he will take the attendant risk.[5]

Optional route. If the contract gives the carrier an option as to the route to be chosen, the exercise thereof must be reasonable in view of the circumstances and the interest of the shipper.[6]

The carrier is not responsible for failure to employ the route directed by the shipper where the contract of shipment gives it the right to deviate from the route in the case of physical necessity, and such necessity is shown where the designated connecting carrier was not receiving goods for transportation to the point of destination.[7] So, also, where the contract gives the carrier the right to change the route on the happening of certain contingencies, such as flood, and the existence of a flood is proved, no liability attaches.[8]

b. In Absence of Directions by Shipper

In the absence of specific routing directions by the shipper, the carrier may select a route convenient to it; but its option in this respect must be exercised with due regard to the rights and interests of the shipper.

The general rule is that, when no special instructions are given and assented to as to routes, the initial carrier may ordinarily select the route or use that commonly employed by it to the point of destination named, and the absence of special instructions given and acceded to amounts to an assent that the carrier's usual course of business may be followed, and that it may designate the route as its convenience may suggest;[9] the carrier's right in this regard is, however, not an absolute or inalienable one, and it may be waived or surrendered by a subsequent agreement.[10] Notwithstanding this rule, the carrier in selecting the route must have due regard to the rights and the interests of the shipper and exercise its option of selecting a route so that it will not work to the disadvantage of the shipper, unless under circumstances which require it.[11] Thus, the carrier must ordinarily select the shortest,[12] cheapest,[13] safest,[14] and most available[15] route; and, if the carrier is not informed of any reason for delivery of the goods to destination within a specified time, nor requested to use the shortest route, its shipment over a longer and cheaper route does not constitute a conversion.[16] The carrier, however, is not bound to employ the cheapest route, where, considering the interests of the shipper, the carrier, and the general public, another route would be more reasonable under the circumstances.[17]

"In the absence of shipping instructions it is ordinarily the duty of the carrier to ship by the cheaper route But the duty is not an absolute one. The obligation of the carrier is to deal justly with the shipper, not to consider only his interests and to disregard wholly its own and those of the general public. If, all things considered, it would be unreasonable to ship by the cheaper route, the carrier is not compelled to do so. The duty is upon the carrier to select the cheaper route only 'if other conditions are reasonably equal.' Resort to the more expensive route may be justified. And the justification may rest either upon the peculiar circumstances of a particular case or upon a general practice"—Northern Pac. Ry. Co. v. Solum, 38 S Ct. 550, 552, 247 U S. 477, 62 L Ed. 1221, reversing Solum v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 157 N W 996, 133 Minn 93, and Monarch Elevator Co. v. Northern Pac. Efficient operation of carrier

(1) Carrier justifiably selected customary but more expensive route for unrouted furniture shipments, where cheaper route would involve additional switching, handling, clerical work, and mileage and would otherwise not be consonant with efficient and economical operation of the carrier—Borst v. Chicago & N W Ry. Co, D C Minn., 3 F.Supp. 139.

(2) Carrier is not bound to route shipment on intrastate line to secure lower rate, when easier grade and shorter distance call for interstate route.—Comstock Farmers' Elevator Co. v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 163 N. W. 280, 137 Minn. 470.

§ 46. Duty to Divert Shipment at Request of Owner of Goods

The nature, extent, and consequences of a carrier's duty to observe the shipper's order to divert the shipment of goods in transit at any intermediate point through which it passes is treated in § 147 infra; and, the availability of such diversion as a defense to the carrier in an action against it for injury to the goods shipped is treated in § 245 infra.

§ 47. Correlative Right of Carrier to Furnish Facilities and to Charge for Them

The right of a carrier exclusively to furnish the services and facilities which the law requires it to provide is treated in § 40 supra, and the right to charge for services is treated in § 314 infra.

§ 48. Miscellaneous Rights and Duties Imposed by Exceptional Circumstances

a. Sale of goods

b. Other rights and duties

a. Sale of Goods

Notwithstanding that a carrier ordinarily does not have the right to sell goods in transportation, it has the right and duty to sell perishable goods where necessary to prevent loss to the shipper.

A bailment of goods to a carrier confers no power of sale.[18] The contract relates to their transportation; and the carrier has no implied right to sell them under ordinary circumstances.[19] Statutes which authorize a carrier to store unclaimed freight do not authorize the sale of unclaimed freight.[20] Nevertheless, it is held, in some cases under statutes so authorizing, and in other cases apparently independent of statute, that a carrier has the right[21] and duty[22] to sell perishable goods where such sale becomes necessary to prevent loss to the shipper or to the owner. This principle is applicable where goods cannot be delivered as required by the bill of lading,[23] as where the consignee refuses to accept them.[24] The carrier has discharged its full duty to the shipper by giving notice of arrival to the party designated in the bill of lading, and after a reasonable time, notice of sale to the consignor, before actually selling the goods.[25] It has been held, however, that, in the absence of a statute otherwise providing,[26] it is the duty of the carrier to notify the shipper, when this is practicable, before selling the goods, and a failure to do so renders it liable for the value of the goods.[27] Further, the sale

If there is but one usual and practical route, the railroad company should use that route, even though there is another route carrying a cheaper rate—Frazier & Crews v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 13 Tenn.App. 387.

Even where carriage charges remain unpaid or consignee is absent or rejects goods tendered, carrier cannot of own mere motion, without aid of enabling statute, summarily dispose of goods, and a carrier, except under judicial order or legal process, cannot sell goods.—Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Gentile Bros. Co., 191 N E 369, 47 Ohio App 162, error dismissed 190 N.E. 578, 128 Ohio St 50.

Good faith immaterial

Carrier's good faith in selling damaged shipment, and honest exercise of discretion, will not protect it, if there existed no necessity for sale.—Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Gentile Bros Co., 191 N.E. 369, 47 Ohio App 162, error dismissed 190 N.E. 578, 128 Ohio St 50.

Trust imposed on carrier

If it becomes necessary to sell goods shipped because of their perishable nature, carrier must first consider what is best to be done for owner, for trust is imposed on him respecting goods which he cannot ignore to make his own lien effectual—Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Gentile Bros. Co , 191 N E 369, 47 Ohio App. 162, error dismissed 190 N E. 578, 128 Ohio St. 50.

Reason for rule

The right and duty of the carrier to sell perishable goods under certain circumstances is based on the principle that when goods cannot be delivered as directed, the carrier becomes a trustee for the owner charged with the duty to use all reasonable efforts to protect him from loss.—Merchants' & Miners' Transp. Co. v. Branch, C C A Va , 282 F 494.

should be made only after such notice of the sale as will reasonably assure that the goods to be sold will bring their reasonable market value.[28] It is not essential that the sale shall be made at the place of destination.[29] It may be made at the place where the property will bring the best price,[30] and it has been held that the owner, to avoid a sale at a place other than the point of destination, must show that the place selected was unreasonable and that he was probably injured.[31]

b. Other Rights and Duties

Besides other rights and duties, a carrier has the duty not to unreasonably detain the shipper's cars for its own purposes in violation of his instructions; it has the right to receive and transport dangerous articles; it may be authorized to make a necessary customs entry; and it may have the duty of seeing that a bill of lading is accompanied by an inspection certificate.

In the absence of contrary statute, it is the duty of a carrier not unreasonably to detain and use the shipper's cars for the carrier's own purposes in violation of the shipper's instructions, and it will be liable to the shipper for any such detention and use. Such liability is unaffected by the carrier's freight tariff filed with the interstate commerce commission, which specifies the rate to be paid the shipper for the use of the cars.[32]

A carrier has the right to receive and transport dangerous articles; but it must exercise ordinary care to the end that the same may be safely transported without injury to others, and such care must be proportionate to the danger incident to the handling of the goods.[33]

Where a carrier requires a coal company to specify separately the cars required for shipments of coal to be used by the railroad and to private consignees, it has the right to use the coal put in cars requisitioned for delivery of fuel to it, notwithstanding that the shipper intended such coal to be sent to private consignees, where, due to a shortage of cars, the coal company would not have received such cars for shipments to private consignees.[34]

The carrier may be authorized to make the customs entry where goods are transferred from one country into another.[35]

Where cattle are inspected before shipment and a certificate of good health is issued by a United States inspector, which certificate would have entitled the cattle to be further transported and sold at a higher price, as intended, it is the carrier's duty to have the inspection certificate required by the regulations of the agricultural department accompany the shipment to destination with the proper bill of lading.[36] A carrier, however, is under no duty to furnish gratuitously information as to quarantine regulations affecting the shipment of live stock,[37] and in so doing no peculiar relation of trust or confidence exists so as to render the carrier liable for giving inaccurate information as to such regulations.[38]

Notice by intended purchaser of necessity of sale

The carrier is not ordinarily excused from selling the goods without notice to the owner by the fact, known to the carrier, that the intended purchaser has himself given the owner notice of the necessity of disposition.—Merchants' & Miners' Transp. Co. v. Branch, C.C.A.Va., 282 F. 494.

Carrier's limitation of liability

The regulation of a carrier, in its tariffs on file with the interstate commerce commission, that it shall not be liable to a shipper owning its own cars for delay or diversion, except as authorized in filed tariffs, does not give the carrier the right purposely to detain the cars contrary to their owner's orders for the carrier's own purposes.—J. G. DUTY TO FURNISH SUITABLE CARS

§ 49. For Inanimate Freight

a. In general
b. Particular types of cars
c. Repairs or alterations

a. In General

A common carrier must furnish cars suitable for the safe transportation of inanimate property which it undertakes to carry, and is liable for injuries resulting from a failure so to do, unless excused by circumstances beyond its control.

It is the primary duty of the common carrier to select and furnish cars suitable in every respect for the safe transportation of inanimate property which it undertakes to carry, and any failure to observe its duty in this regard will render it liable for loss or injury caused thereby.[39] Under some

Interstate Commerce Act

(1) Safe and adequate car service must be furnished by a carrier under the Interstate Commerce Act—Midland Valley R. Co. v. Barkley, 291 S.W. 431, 172 Ark. 898, certiorari granted 48 S.Ct. 37, 275 U.S. 514, 72 L.Ed. 401, reversed on other grounds 48 S.Ct. 342, 276 U.S. 482, 72 L.Ed. 664.

(2) Common law obligation not abrogated by rules of the interstate commerce commission under which a carrier is liable for failure to furnish a car of the type specified in the shipper's order—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Evans, 134 S.E. 122, 35 Ga.App. 438.

Condition of goods when loaded does not affect the shipper's right to recover for damages resulting from the carrier's negligence in failing to provide suitable cars.—Cleburne Peanut & Products Co. v. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. of Texas, Tex. Com.App., 221 S.W. 270, reversing, Civ.App., 184 S.W. 1070.

Delay in furnishing suitable cars
Ky.—Davis v. McKinley, 255 S.W. 523, 200 Ky. 699.

Liability as carrier or warehouseman

Whether injury to a shipment in defective cars occurred before or after the carrier's liability changed to that of a warehouseman is immaterial.

Tex.—Davis v. Standard Rice Co., Civ.App., 293 S.W. 593.

Liability for lessee's breach of duty

A railroad corporation chartered by the state is liable for a tortious breach by a lessee of its tracks of the common-law duty to furnish suitable cars on the request of a shipper, in the absence of a statute exempting the corporation from such liability.—Southwestern R. Co. v. Davies, 186 S.E. 899, 53 Ga.App. 712.

Liability to purchaser from consignee

A purchaser of feed from the consignee may recover from the carrier from damages sustained by the purchaser as a result of the fact that the feed had become poisoned by white lead found on the bottom and sides of the car in which the feed had been transported.—Grandt v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 195 Ill. App. 187.

Newness of car not a defense where the shipment reached its destination in a damaged condition, although it is a circumstance to be considered by the jury—Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Tullis, Tex. Civ.App., 8 S.W.2d 247, error dismissed.

Evidence held to support verdict for the shipper in an action by the carrier against the shipper wherein the shipper pleaded a set-off based on the carrier's failure to furnish suitable cars.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tate, 91 S.E. 883, 19 Ga.App. 507.

Findings held not to sustain judgment

In an action against a carrier for failure to furnish suitable cars, spe-authority, a carrier is required to furnish cars perfect in all their parts,[40] and no defect in a car will excuse the carrier from liability on proof of injury to the goods,[41] but under other authority the carrier is not bound to furnish perfect cars,[42] or, as will be shown infra § 54, with regard to live stock, even the safest and best cars, but only cars which are suitable and safe for the purposes for which they are to be used. Cars furnished must be such as will protect the goods from the elements,[43] although if they are suitable the carrier will not be liable for loss or injury resulting from unprecedented weather.[44] Moreover, it is not liable for failure to furnish suitable cars where it was prevented from doing so by extraordinary circumstances which it could not have foreseen and against which it could not have provided,[45] such as an unprecedented demand for the only cars suitable in the circumstances, or an abnormal prolonged detention of such cars on connecting lines,[46] or where the cars were needed by the carrier in the operation of its trains;[47] nor can it be required, in such circumstances, to carry the goods in an unsuitable car at its own risk.[48]

b. Particular Types of Cars

A carrier must furnish refrigerator or ventilated cars where necessary for the safe transportation of goods it undertakes to carry; tank cars need not be furnished. The furnishing of open cars is a breach of duty where such cars do not afford proper protection, unless the goods are such that they can be carried only on such a car.

Refrigerator cars. A carrier undertaking the shipment of perishable goods requiring protection from heat must furnish cars specially adapted to the preservation of such goods, such as refrigerator cars, during the time required for their transition from the place of shipment to the place of destination,[49] and will not be excused from liability for cial findings of the jury that the carrier was not negligent in furnishing the kind of cars it did, that one car was suitable but the other was not, and that the carrier's failure to furnish suitable cars was negligence, were conflicting and could not sustain a judgment for the shipper, but the jury should have been required to reconcile their findings if they could do so—Wichita Valley Ry. loss or injury by a shortage of refrigerator cars where it can adapt other cars to the carriage of such goods.[50]

Ventilated cars. If a ventilated car is the only reasonably safe means of carrying goods offered for transportation, a ventilated car must be furnished, and if loss or injury results from a failure to provide a car of this character, the carrier must respond in damages.[51]

Tank cars. A railroad is not bound to furnish tank cars for the transportation of oil,[52] even where it holds itself out as willing to carry oil in tank cars.[53]

Open cars. If open cars will not afford proper protection to the commodity offered for transportation, the furnishing of such cars in consequence of which loss is sustained is ordinarily a breach of the carrier's common-law duty for which the carrier is liable.[54] However, it has been held that a carrier is not negligent in transporting on an open flat car freight likely to be injured by the weather, where the size of the box in which the freight is packed renders it impossible to put the freight in a box car, and proper precautions are taken to protect it from the weather.[55]

c. Repairs or Alterations

Cars properly coopered or equipped with car door boards, bulkheads, or special floors must be furnished where necessary for the safe transportation of property. However, trivial repairs or alterations may be made by the shipper where greater damage will thereby be averted, although, under some authority, only after notice to, or under a contract with, the carrier.

If cooperage, car door boards, bulkheads,[56] or special floors[57] are necessary to render the cars safe and suitable for the character of commodity shipped, cars thus repaired or equipped must be furnished. However, the shipper himself may make trivial repairs or alterations where such repairs or alterations will render a defective car suitable and avert a greater damage which would result from a rejection of the car,[58] and may recover, under some authorities, the reasonable

Demurrer to evidence properly overruled where the evidence as to the condition of the cars furnished and the necessity for immediate use of the cars established the existence of an emergency justifying the shipper in making slight repairs in order to prevent loss and damage which probably would have resulted from use of the cars in the condition in which they were furnished.—Todd v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., Mo.App., 21 S.W.2d 1.

expense thereof,[59] or, under other authority, at least the necessary expense of lumber.[60] On the other hand, the shipper is not entitled to make such repairs or alterations in the absence of a probability that greater damage to him or to the carrier will thereby be averted,[61] and it has been held that he cannot recover for trivial alterations which he made voluntarily without calling the carrier's attention to their necessity or requesting other cars or entering into a special contract.[62]

§ 50. Liability for Loss or Injury Caused by Defective Cars Not Owned by Carrier

A carrier's duty to furnish suitable cars for the transportation of inanimate property is ordinarily the same whether the cars belong to the carrier or to another. However, a carrier is not liable, under most authority, for loss resulting from defects in cars furnished by the shipper, at least where the defects are not discoverable by the exercise of due care.

Generally speaking, a carrier's duty to furnish safe and suitable cars for the transportation of inanimate property is the same whether the cars belong to the carrier or to another.[63] However, where the shipper undertakes to furnish the cars used in transportation, it is generally held that the carrier is not liable for a loss resulting from their defective condition,[64] especially if such condition could not have been discovered by the carrier by the exercise of due care.[65] On the other hand, the carrier has been held liable where it could have discovered the defective condition and prevented the loss by the exercise of reasonable diligence, unless it was released from liability by the shipper,[66] or where it leased the cars from the shipper under an agreement whereby the carrier was to keep the cars in repair at the shipper's cost,[67] and there is even authority holding without qualification that the fact that the car was furnished by the shipper is immaterial.[68]

§ 51. Liability for Injury on Connecting Line Due to Defective Cars

An initial carrier which has negligently furnished a defective car is liable for resulting injuries occurring while the car is on the line of a connecting carrier.

It is the duty of the receiving carrier to select a car which is safe and suitable for the particular shipment.[69] Where an initial carrier negligently furnishes a defective car, it will be liable for resulting injuries occurring while the car is on the line of a connecting carrier.[70]

§ 52. Contract or Custom as Affecting Liability

A carrier's liability for injuries to inanimate freight caused by negligence in failing to furnish suitable cars cannot be limited by contract or custom. However, an agreement releasing the carrier from liability for failure to inspect cars selected by the shipper or for loss from freezing has been held enforceable.

In accordance with the general principle that a common carrier cannot limit its liability for injuries to goods caused by its own negligence, see infra § 99, a carrier's liability for injuries to inanimate property caused by its negligence in failing to furnish suitable cars cannot be limited by contract[71] or by custom;[72] nor can an initial carrier limit its liability for injuries occurring on the line of a connecting carrier as the result of the initial carrier's negligence in failing to furnish a suitable car by a contract with the shipper that the initial carrier shall be liable only for loss or injury occurring on its own line.[73] However, an agreement releasing a carrier from liability for failure to inspect cars selected by the shipper has been held not to be void or unenforceable by reason of any federal statute,[74] and an agreement releasing a carrier from liability for loss by freezing has been held to preclude a recovery for such loss.[75]

§ 53. Assumption of Risk by Shipper

Ordinarily it is not the shipper's duty to select suitable cars, but the carrier is relieved from liability for failure to furnish such cars if the shipper himself voluntarily selects cars under an express contract or in circumstances charging him with full knowledge of all defects and in reliance on his own, rather than on the carrier's, judgment.

Ordinarily it is not the shipper's duty to specify the type of cars to be furnished,[76] or to inspect cars furnished,[77] and the mere fact that the shipper has inspected a car,[78] or knows of the defects,[79] will not exempt the carrier from liability for loss or injury resulting from such defects, at least where, as a practical matter, the shipper has no course but to accept the cars in their unsuitable condition.[80] or in circumstances charging him with full knowledge of their capabilities and defects, relying on his own judgment rather than on the duty of the carrier, the carrier is not liable for loss or injury caused by such defects.[81] However, the carrier is not relieved of liability if the defects were latent and not readily discoverable,[82] or the shipper was without knowledge that the cars were unsuitable for his purposes.[83] Moreover, it must appear either that there was a distinct agreement by the shipper to assume the risk of the sufficiency of the car furnished,[84] or that the shipper did not leave the selection of the car to the carrier, but assumed that duty himself.[85]

§ 54. For Live Stock

A common carrier must furnish cars suitable for the safe transportation of live stock it undertakes to carry, and is liable for injuries resulting from a failure so to do. Included in such duty is the furnishing of sufficient ventilating facilities, bedding, or partitions where necessary for the safe transportation of particular stock.

A railroad company undertaking to ship live stock must furnish a car that is reasonably safe and suitable for the transportation of the particular kind of stock to be shipped, and is liable for injuries resulting from its failure so to do.[86]

Reason for rule
"Where the shipper exercises his own judgment, is not deceived or misled by the carrier, and chooses a car for the transportation of his property, the carrier is not answerable for the sufficiency of the car, at least where the shipper selects the car in consideration of a reduced rate, or the like, for in such a case he does not trust to the carrier nor rely upon the duty of the carrier, but, on the contrary, freely exercises his right of choice, and relies entirely upon his own judgment, so that there is no reason for affirming that the carrier was guilty of any wrong."—Edward Frolich Glass Co. v. Defective door held gross negligence
The furnishing of a car with a door which could not be closed was gross negligence, bringing the carrier's liability within the terms of a contract exempting it from liability except for gross negligence—Root v. New York, etc., R. Co., 83 Hun., N.Y., 111.

Liability for negligence of agents or employees
(1) A carrier is liable for the negligence of subordinate agents in failing to furnish suitable cars for live stock, irrespective of whether its chief officers had no knowledge of such negligence and had selected proper subordinate agents.—Great Western R. Co. v. Hawkins, 18 Mich. 427.

(2) Also, a carrier is liable for the loss of live stock poisoned by a disinfectant negligently prepared by the carrier's employees, even though the carrier was required by law to employ a state veterinarian to supervise the process—Smith v. Payne, 206 P. 715, 60 Utah 89.

Proof held sufficient under petition
Under a petition alleging that no car was furnished, proof that only a double-decked car was furnished has been held sufficient where such a car was not suitable for the transportation of the stock tendered, since the furnishing of such a car is the same as furnishing no car—Vitt v. Wabash Ry. Co., Mo.App., 251 S.W. 734.

Evidence held insufficient to enable the jury to estimate damages in an action by a shipper against a

Moreover, cars must be safe not only when originally furnished, but also throughout the trip.[87] If large, heavy, strong animals are shipped, the car must be proportionately safe and strong,[88] and if, because of defects in cars, the animals being transported escape, the carrier will be liable for the loss.[89] Also, it is the duty of the carrier to furnish cars free from contagious animal diseases, and its failure so to do will render it liable for the resulting damages.[90]

However, it has been held that a carrier is not bound to furnish a particular type of car for the shipment of live stock,[91] at least if it does not own, and its tariff stipulates that it will not furnish, such cars.[92] Also, it is generally held that the carrier is not bound to furnish the safest and best cars,[93] and that its duty is complied with where the cars are reasonably safe and suitable for the purposes for which they are to be used.[94] Thus, if suitable cars are furnished and due care is exercised, it is generally held that the carrier is not liable for injuries resulting by reason of the viciousness and unruly disposition of the animals or from any inherent vice.[95] On the other hand, the fact that the cars furnished were those which the carrier always used,[96] or which were "in general and approved use,"[97] is not a defense if such cars were not suitable in the particular circumstances.

Particular equipment or preparation. The duty to furnish suitable cars includes the furnishing of sufficient facilities for the proper ventilation thereof.[98] Also, a carrier is ordinarily bound to furnish suitable bedding where bedding is necessary to render the cars safe and suitable for the kind of animals shipped,[99] and, whether or not

Failure to bed car not negligence per se, as a matter of law, but will render a carrier liable if bedding is usual and customary, and a precaution such as a prudent, competent, and faithful man, experienced in business would take, in the circumstances—East Tennessee, etc, R. Co. v. Johnston, 75 Ala 596, 51 Am. R. 489.

Duty where shipper unable to bed car

Despite a contract limiting the carrier's liability to injuries resulting from a collision or derailment, and a custom of shippers to provide bedding, a carrier is liable for failure to bed cars into which it reloaded the live stock following an accident to the original cars, where the shipper had no opportunity to bed the cars—McDaniel v. Chicago, etc., R Co, 24 Iowa 412.

Injury caused by vicious propensities of animals incited and caused to be exercised by the carrier's neglibound to, if it undertakes to bed the cars, it must exercise at least ordinary care to see that the bedding is properly done,[1] and if injury results from failure to provide bedding or from improper bedding, the carrier will be liable. However, it is sufficient if the car is bedded so as to be reasonably safe.[2] Partitions put in a car by the carrier for the proper transportation of particular live stock must be reasonably safe.[3]

§ 55. Liability for Injury Caused by Defective Cars Not Owned by Carrier

A carrier is liable for loss or injury to live stock resulting from defects in cars used by it in transporting the stock, irrespective of whether it owned the cars.

The fact that cars used by the carrier for the transportation of stock, do not belong to it will not relieve it from liability for loss or injury caused by the defective condition of such cars.[4]

§ 56. Liability for Injuries on Connecting Line Due to Defective Cars

A common carrier assuming the transportation of live stock to a point beyond its own line must deliver the stock at its own terminus in cars suitable for transportation of the stock to its destination, and is liable for loss caused by defects in the cars whether the loss occurs on its own line or on that of a connecting carrier.

If a carrier assumes the transportation of stock to a point beyond its own line, it must deliver the stock at the terminus of its own road in cars suitable for the transportation of the stock to the point of destination,[5] and is liable for injury to the stock caused by the defective condition of a car whether the injury occurred on its own line or on that of a connecting carrier.[6]

§ 57. Contractual Provisions Limiting Liability

Under most, but not all, authority, a carrier's liability for injuries to live stock caused by negligence in furnishing defective cars cannot be limited by a contract requiring the shipper to select the cars, or to send attendants, or stipulating that the shipper has examined and accepts the car as suitable, or restricting liability to injuries occurring on the carrier's own line.

In accordance with the well settled principle that a common carrier cannot limit its liability for injuries to goods caused by its own negligence, see infra § 99, a carrier cannot by contract or otherwise relieve itself from the consequences of its own negligence in failing to furnish suitable cars for the transportation of live stock.[7] Accordingly, it is generally held that it cannot evade its duty to furnish suitable cars, or its liability for failure to perform such duty, by a mere stipulation in the shipping contract or bill of lading devolving on the shipper the duty of selecting suitable cars,[8] or of sending an attendant with the stock,[9] or by a general stipulation that the shipper has examined the car in which the stock is shipped and accepts it as suitable and sufficient.[10] However, there is other authority holding that a carrier is relieved of liability by a stipulation of the last type, where based on a sufficient consideration,[11] unless the defect was latent,[12] or by a stipulation that the carrier will not be liable for loss caused by improper bedding,[13] or where by contract the shipper assumed the duty of proper storage of the live stock, and accepted and loaded the car without objection, knowing that it was unsuitable;[14] but such contracts will not be extended beyond the strict letter of the agreement.[15] An initial carrier cannot, by a contract with the shipper limiting the carrier's liability to loss or injury occurring on its own line, relieve itself of liability for injuries occurring on the line of a connecting carrier because of the initial carrier's negligence in furnishing defective cars.[16]

§ 58. Assumption of Risk by Shipper

A shipper's inspection, knowledge of defects, presence during loading, or attempt to prepare the car does not ordinarily relieve the carrier of liability for furnishing defective cars, but it is generally held that the shipper assumes the risk where he makes his own selection knowing of the defects, and, under some, but not all, authority, under a distinct agreement to assume the risk.

A shipper is not bound to inspect cars to determine whether they are suitable for the transportation of his live stock,[17] and it is generally held that the carrier is not relieved from liability for negligence in failing to furnish suitable cars by the mere fact that the shipper examined the car and made no objections to its fitness,[18] or knew of the defects,[19] at least where, as a practical matter, he had no course but to accept the cars in their unsuitable condition,[20] or was present while the stock was being loaded, although having no control over the cars,[21] or attempted to put the car in proper condition.[22]

On the other hand, it is generally held that where the shipper of live stock makes his own selection of the vehicles under circumstances which charge him with full knowledge of all their capabilities and defects, the carrier is not responsible for injury which may result exclusively from such defects.[23] Under some authority, nothing less than a distinct agreement to assume the risk is sufficient,[24] but under other authority it is sufficient to relieve the carrier of liability that the shipper accepts the cars fully aware that they are manifestly unfit for the purpose intended and are likely to produce loss or injury,[25] especially where the defect is not known to the carrier.[26] Also, it must appear that the shipper assented to the use of the cars with notice of their actual condition,[27] and the carrier is not relieved of liability where the defects were latent and not readily discoverable,[28] at least if the carrier had knowledge of such defects.[29] Furthermore, it has been said that if the car is reasonably suitable, and the shipper merely indulges his whim to change conditions, he takes his own risk with respect to any alteration he makes.[30]

H. CARE OF PROPERTY WHILE IN TRANSIT

§ 59. Introductory Statement

As stated in § 40 supra, the carrier is bound to exercise such care as is required to protect the goods from loss or injury during transportation. The similar duty of connecting carriers is treated in § 421 infra.

§ 60. Inanimate Freight

A carrier is bound to protect goods in transit by exercising the care and diligence required by the nature of the goods and the circumstances.

Ordinarily, the carrier and not the shipper is responsible for the proper care of goods in transit.[31] If the carrier knows that the doing of a particular act is necessary for the safety of the goods, and that such act may be performed without imposing upon it any burden for which it is not fully compensated, a failure to protect the shipment by the doing of such act constitutes negligence as a matter of law.[32] In other words, the carrier is bound to exercise the care and diligence that the character of the goods and the circumstances require,[33] and the necessary standard of care may increase or diminish according to the nature of the shipment.[34]

Care of perishable goods. The shipment of goods of a perishable nature requires a higher degree of care than shipments of other articles not inherently perishable.[35] If the carrier holds itself out as proposing to provide means of preserving such goods during transit, it is responsible for the exercise of ordinary care in the furnishing of the necessary facilities,[36] but it has been held that the refusal of the carrier to perform special services en route, not offered to shippers generally by its tariffs, will not support a charge of negligence, as to perishable fruit, unless, perhaps, in the case of a great emergency.[37] The carrier, in the absence of an agreement to do so, is not bound to heat cars to protect perishable goods from freezing,[38] as where it undertakes no such obligation but merely permits the shipper to furnish the heat at his own expense,[39] nor does such a duty exist in the case of an interstate shipment for which the filed tariff provides for heating by the shipper only.[40] The fact that the bill of lading contains a contractual obligation to perform some specific act as to ventilation does not relieve the carrier from its common-law duty otherwise to use due care to prevent the decay of perishable goods.[41]

A tariff provision that all protective service to certain fruits in transit will be governed by the shipper's written instruction is intended to regulate the handling of shipments and not to limit the amount of recovery, and, hence, is not void as limiting the carrier's liability.[42]

Protection against fire loss. While the carrier is required to furnish reasonably adequate protection against fire loss to goods in transit,[43] it is not required to provide fire equipment adequate to protect against loss to the shipment from a fire caused by heating apparatus voluntarily furnished and used by the shipper with the carrier's consent.[44]

§ 61. Refrigeration

A carrier must exercise proper care and diligence in providing refrigeration necessary for the preservation of perishable goods. Correlative to its duty, the carrier has the exclusive right to furnish ice where needed.

As previously shown in § 49 supra, when a carrier undertakes the transportation of perishable goods, it is its duty to furnish cars especially adopted for the preservation of that class of goods. In addition, the rule stated in § 60 supra, that the carrier must exercise the degree of diligence required by the character of the goods, applies to goods shipped in refrigerator cars,[45] and consequently the carrier is under the duty to exercise care and diligence in providing the necessary refrigeration,[46] and is prima facie liable for injury to perishable

Where precooling of refrigerator cars took place after delivery of fresh vegetables to carrier, negligence in precooling and icing cars is attributable, not to shipper, but to carrier.—Wells Fargo & Co. v. Sprague, Tex.Civ.App., 199 S.W. 657.

Refrigeration basis of separate charge

Loss to fruit from imperfect refrigeration was damage for which a carrier was liable under a provision in bill of lading that the amount of "any" loss or damage for which it was liable should be computed on basis of value of property at place and time of shipment notwithstanding there was a separate and distinct charge for refrigeration inasmuch as the refrigeration was inseparably connected with the transportation.—Crenshaw Bros. & Saffold v. Southern Pac. Co., 181 P. 252, 40 Cal.App.

goods resulting from defective refrigeration.[47] Although the duty has been said to be a contractual one,[48] it is in no way dependent on an express contract imposing it, and the carrier's liability is not affected by the fact that the bill of lading is silent on the subject.[49]

In accordance with these rules, unless such duty is voluntarily assumed by the shipper,[50] if the class of goods shipped requires refrigeration for their preservation, it is the duty of the carrier to provide a supply of ice sufficient for the purpose, and it will be liable for damages resulting from nonperformance.[51] Further, the carrier must use due care in seeing that the ice effectively refrigerates the goods.[52] Such ice must be furnished not only at the point of shipment, but at such places along its line as will reasonably insure a safe transit to the point of destination,[53] especially where re-icing is rendered necessary by delay attributable to the carrier's negligence.[54] Moreover, the carrier may be liable for damages caused by its failure to exercise the care required to re-ice in transit notwithstand-

(1) "The plaintiff says it was the duty of the Public Belt Railroad to have iced the car. We do not think so. . . . ing it has complied with the terms of a bill of lading which calls for re-icing en route only at regular icing stations.[55]

Where injury results to a shipment of perishable property because of the carrier's failure properly to ice the cars, the carrier cannot evade responsibility for the resulting injury by showing that the cars belonged to another company.[56]

The carrier's liability for injuries caused by insufficient icing is not affected by the fact that the shipper discovered that the cars were insufficiently iced before their departure, if they had no opportunity to remedy the situation and believed that the goods would reach their destination without injury,[57] or if the shipper called the attention of the carrier's agent to the fact that the cars were insufficiently iced and was assured that sufficient ice would be furnished.[58] That the shipper was lacking in knowledge or skill in loading or was negligent in any way has also been held not to be a defense as to the carrier's negligence in not providing proper refrigeration.[59]

On the other hand, a carrier is not required to give a shipment extraordinary treatment by providing ice at places where ice is not ordinarily needed.[60] So, where cars are properly iced at the nearest station to that at which the goods are shipped, the carrier is not required to re-ice the cars at the point of shipment where it has no icing plant, and where the necessity of re-icing is caused by the delay of plaintiff in loading the cars.[61] Where a statute so provides, the carrier is not bound to re-ice in the absence of specific instructions from the shipper, notwithstanding a delay in transit;[62] nor is the carrier obliged to re-ice cars containing perishable goods in the absence of directions by the shipper, where the bill of lading exempts it from liability for injury caused by heat.[63] Where the shippers of perishable goods undertake to supply a refrigerator car with ice, the carrier has a right to assume, except as facts may exist that put it on notice to the contrary, that the shippers have furnished enough ice to keep the car cool until a delivery to the consignee can be had in the ordinary course of business.[64]

Shipper's instructions as to icing. In any event, the carrier must follow the shipper's instructions as to icing and it will be liable for damages resulting from an action contrary to instructions regardless of its propriety.[65] So the carrier is responsible for damage caused by its icing of cars when ordered to transport without icing,[66] or by its failure to remove ice after it had been requested to do so.[67] The carrier is relieved of its duty to re-ice in transit where the consignee expressly so directs, as under the circumstances the latter assumes all risk of damage.[68]

Correlative right to furnish ice. Where the carrier is under obligation to furnish ice for refrigeration, it has the corresponding right to furnish ice where it is needed.[69] However, it is not to be understood from what is here said that because carriers have ice on hand they can compel the shipper to have his goods iced where on account of the state of the weather or for other cause he prefers to have them forwarded under ventilation only[70] Further, a carrier may not arbitrarily characterize a certain product as perishable, and require that the shipper use the refrigeration equipment provided, if it is practicable to use some other character of equipment at a much less freight rate.[71]

§ 62. Ventilation

Unless the shipper assumes such responsibility, it is the carrier's duty, independent of any express contract, to see that goods requiring such care are properly ventilated, and it must follow any directions as to ventilation provided for in the contract of shipment.

If the preservation of perishable goods requires that the cars in which they are shipped shall be ventilated, it is the carrier's duty, independent of any express contract, to see that they are kept properly ventilated, and a failure to comply with it resulting in loss or injury will render the carrier liable for damages[72] So a carrier is liable for deterioration resulting from placing perishable goods in a hot, unventilated freight house.[73] Where the contract of shipment makes provision for ventilation, the carrier will be liable for failure to observe instructions contained therein regardless of whether or not it was in the exercise of due care in handling the ventilation appliances,[74] although if it follows the shipper's written instructions it will not be liable for any damage resulting therefrom.[75] When the shipper undertakes to ventilate the car, the carrier is relieved of all responsibility as to ventilation, unless it commits some overt act causing damage.[76]

§ 63. Live Stock

- a. In general
- b Care as to particular matters
- c. Effect of caretaker accompanying shipment
- d. Validity and effect of contract shifting duty of care to shipper

a. In General

Generally the liability of a carrier of live stock is similar to that of carriers of goods.

It is generally held that a carrier receiving live stock for transportation does so under the usual liabilities which attach to the carriers of goods,[77] subject, however, to the rule stated in § 79 infra, applicable in case of other goods, that it is not accountable for loss resulting from the inherent nature of the property, and not due to any negligence or fault on its part. According to some authority, however, in view of the fact that animals have some volition and propensities of their own which may lead to loss or damage regardless of the control exercised by those who undertake their transportation, carriers of live stock are not liable, in the care of live stock being transported, as common carriers, but are only bound to transport with ordinary care and skill.[78]

Accordingly, as a general rule, the carrier is bound to use reasonable care to transport without injury live stock placed in its hands for shipment and it will be liable for damage or for loss proximately resulting from its failure so to do[79] It is,

Otherwise stated
A carrier is charged with the duty of delivering a car of animals in good condition or to explain the failure to do so.—Morrow v Wabash Ry. Co, Mo App, 6 S.W 2d 628.

Mistreatment before shipment
It is the duty of a carrier to use reasonable care to protect a hog, while under its care in its possession for transportation, from meddlesome interference with, or mistreatment by, strangers, likely to render it unfit for shipment.—Cole v. American

however, required to use only such care to avoid injury as a person of ordinary prudence would use under the same or similar circumstances,[80] and it is not absolutely bound to deliver the stock in good condition.[81]

Transportation of live stock in a reasonably safe manner is in some jurisdictions a nondelegable statutory duty,[82] and the person designated by the carrier to perform this duty is in law the carrier itself.[83] This duty of safe transport exists independently of any contract,[84] so that, in a case where it is applicable, the office of a contract is not to create the duty, but only to make it obligatory.[85] It has also been held that, in the absence of a statute or a provision in the bill of lading, the common-law rule as to the duty to care for live stock in transportation is imported into, and becomes a part of, the contract.[86] The fact that the carrier cannot make a charge for a service, unless such charge is provided for in the published tariffs and classifications, see infra § 302, does not affect the existence of the duty to render such service as is necessary to the proper care of live stock in transit.[87]

The release of the carrier for a certain time from the duty of feeding and watering the animals does not relieve it from its duty otherwise during this period to exercise proper care in transporting the shipment.[88]

A carrier transporting live stock under a uniform live stock contract limiting its liability is nevertheless subject to a statute requiring the exercise of "extraordinary care."[89]

b. Care as to Particular Matters

The rule requiring a carrier to exercise reasonable care for the safety and protection of live stock carried by it is one of general application.

The rule set forth in the preceding subsection is one of wide application, and has been applied in a number of situations in addition to the duties set forth in detail in the sections immediately following this section.

Bedding. The carrier must use proper care in providing bedding for the animals, and it will be liable for injuries resulting from improper bedding,[90] unless the shipper knew of the bedding supplied and acquiesced[91] It is negligence on the part of the carrier to place a stock car in which straw bedding is used near to the engine, so as to expose the animals to danger of loss by reason of fire being communicated by sparks to the straw.[92]

Escape of animals. Care must also be exercised during the transportation to prevent the animals shipped from escaping through the windows or the doors of the car,[93] and also to prevent their escape when they are unloaded for some reason incident to the transportation.[94] It has also been held that a carrier's exemption in the bill of lading from risks in caring for cattle is not applicable to prevent its liability for the escape of cattle from pens in which they had been placed prior to shipment, before the issuance of such bill of lading.[95]

Exercising animals. A carrier is under the duty to obey the instruction of the shipper to exercise a dog shipped in a crate and it will be liable for injury resulting from disobedience of this instruction.[96]

Furnishing attendants. The carrier is not bound to furnish attendants for animals which it assumes to transport, where such attendants are not reasonably necessary.[97] So, the carrier is not required to keep some person present to watch a car of live stock sidetracked in a railroad yard to see that the animals are not moved and injured.[98]

Handling of train. The carrier must use due and proper care in the handling of the train in which live stock is shipped.[99] Thus, the trains must be so managed as not to injure the animals by unnecessary concussion.[1] It has also been held that a railroad company is guilty of gross carelessness in making a "flying switch," whereby one freight car is kicked violently against another containing animals, thereby injuring them.[2] The fact that the shipper undertakes to accompany his stock in a car, and to look after it to a limited extent, does not relieve the carrier of the duty to prevent injuries in switching the car.[3] The carrier is bound to exercise care commensurate with the increased hazard where it places live stock cars at the end of a "dead freight" train, even though at the caretaker's request.[4]

"Natural vices" and propensities. Care and vigilance must be used to guard against and restrain the natural vices and propensities of the animals themselves, in order to prevent them from injuring themselves and each other.[5] Accordingly, a carrier is responsible for the negligence of its agent in not separating larger cattle from small cattle to prevent their being trampled after discovering some of the cattle down in the car.[6]

Protection of stock from inclement weather. A carrier assumes no duty to resort to unusual care to protect stock from inclement weather.[7] Thus it is not liable for loss or injury caused by unprecedented climatic conditions, where the provisions for the protection of the stock are sufficient for ordinary conditions.[8] However, where cars containing live stock are set on a side track in inclement weather, it is the duty of the carrier to use reasonable care to protect the stock from cold and not to leave them unreasonably exposed;[9] and, if the exercise of such care requires, it must remove, or enable the caretaker to remove, the cattle from the cars.[10] Also, in case animals are unloaded for some reason incident to the transportation, reasonable care must be used in giving them shelter, so far as practicable, from inclement weather.[11]

Removal of dead animals. The failure of the carrier to remove dead cattle on the request of caretakers accompanying the shipment, who explained that the presence of dead cattle was a menace to the others, has been held not to constitute negligence unless the request for their removal was made to some responsible authority.[12]

Showering overheated animals. The duty of showering or throwing water over hogs or other animals that become, or are likely to become, overheated during transportation rests on the carrier who has control of the facilities for so doing,[13]

even though the animals were overcrowded in loading, where it undertakes their transportation with knowledge of that fact.[14] The susceptibility of hogs to overheating, and the danger of death resulting therefrom is not within the common-law exception to liability treated in § 79 infra, for injuries due to the "proper vice" of the animal or inherent weakness over which the carrier would have no control.[15] If water is scarce on the line of a railroad so that it cannot be provided for the purpose of applying to animals shipped in its cars when necessary, it is the duty of the company to inform shippers of the fact before they ship; and if such information is withheld and animals are shipped and die on the route for want of water, the company will be liable.[16] This duty it has been held is one which cannot be evaded by a custom of the carrier[17] or by a special contract.[18] In any event, a contract requiring the shipper to water and feed his animals means no more than that the shipper shall see that the stock is furnished with such food and water as is required for consumption; it does not impose on him the duty of showering the animals to keep down their temperature.[19] All that can be exacted of the shipper accompanying the animals is that he shall keep the employees of the carrier advised as to the condition of the stock, so that they may apply water as necessary;[20] and, where the carrier's employees know the state of the weather and that animals in transit are suffering from heat, the shipper is not required to call attention to conditions with which they are acquainted, but may rely on them to discharge their plain duty of showering as the condition of the animals requires.[21]

c. Effect of Caretaker Accompanying Shipment

Generally, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the carrier's duty of caring for live stock is not affected by the shipper accompanying the shipment.

A carrier is not relieved of the duty to care for live stock properly in transportation by the fact that the shipper or his agent accompanies the shipment,[22] in the absence of a specific agreement that he will care for the stock.[23] It has been held, on the other hand, that the presence of a caretaker relieves the carrier from the duty of giving particular attention to the stock,[24] although it does not relieve it from the duty to afford the caretaker a reasonable opportunity to care for the stock, and consequently from liability for negligence, if injury results therefrom.[25] It has also been held that if the shipper accompanies the stock and assumes to perform certain duties of the carrier with regard to caring for the animals, such fact becomes a material consideration in determining the liability of the carrier.[26] Of course, the carrier is not liable for damage to the animals caused by the negligence of the shipper's caretaker.[27]

d. Validity and Effect of Contract Shifting Duty of Care to Shipper

Except where such contract is regarded as absolving the carrier from liability for negligence, a contract providing that the shipper will care for the stock at his own risk and expense is valid and ordinarily releases the carrier from liability; but, where it knows that the shipper is not accompanying the stock, it must nevertheless give it the necessary attention.

Except where such a contract is regarded as absolving the carrier from its negligence in failing to care for live stock,[28] a contract between a shipper and a carrier which provides that the shipper will at his own risk and expense attend and care for the animals during transportation[29] is, at least where the owner or his agent accompanies the shipment,[30] valid and effective, both as to intra-state and interstate shipments,[31] and, in the absence of gross negligence on its part, the carrier will be relieved from liability therefor.[32] Under such a contract, where the stock is unloaded during transportation, the duty of the carrier is performed when it furnishes suitable yards in proper condition and reasonably secure.[33] It is also competent for the parties to stipulate that the shipper will see that the doors are so fastened as to prevent escape of, or injury to, the animals in transit,[34] although such a contract does not relieve the carrier from the obligation to use reasonable care.[35]

However, although there is some authority to the contrary,[36] it is held that, notwithstanding such contract, where the carrier knows that no one is accompanying the shipment, it is its duty to give the stock the necessary attention, and it cannot under such circumstances be absolved from liability for failure to do so.[37] Also, although the contract requires the shipper to care for cattle awaiting shipment, the carrier must use ordinary care to prevent injury to animals accepted for transportation, while in pens awaiting shipment, if such care is necessitated by its delay.[38]

§ 64. Duty to Provide Feed, Water, and Rest

a. In absence of statute or special contract
b. Contract imposing duty on shipper
c. Statutory duties
d. Time and manner of complying with duty

a. In Absence of Statute or Special Contract

In addition to its duty to provide proper facilities for such purpose, it is the carrier's duty to see that live stock is properly fed, watered, and rested; and it is generally held that this duty, in the absence of contrary specific agreement, is not affected by the fact that the shipper accompanies the shipment.

In addition to the duty to furnish proper and reasonable facilities for such purpose,[39] it is the duty of the carrier to see that live stock in transportation is properly fed, watered, and rested at suitable intervals, so far as is reasonably necessary for keeping such stock in good condition;[40] and the Failure to send attendant due to fault of carrier

Where under a contract a carrier is liable for injuries to animals shipped from neglect unless the animals are accompanied by the owner or an attendant, and the carrier transports the animals without an attendant to its knowledge, the carrier is not relieved from proper care, notwithstanding it was expected that the attendant would accompany the animals, but failed because of misleading information by the carrier's agent as to when the animals would be moved.—Purity Farms v. Duty to provide feed and water to shipper is under no obligation to incur expense in that behalf, especially where the stock is being unlawfully held at destination by the carrier.[41] This obligation to feed, water, and rest live stock exists even in the absence of an express request by the consignor,[42] as such a request will be implied.[43] It also exists in the absence of any statutory provision,[44] although, as will be shown in subsection c infra, the duty is imposed by express statutory provision in some jurisdictions. Even in case of unavoidable delay, it is the duty of the carrier to make reasonable efforts to carry the stock to some point where reasonable facilities for feeding exist, and where food and water are obtainable,[45] and to permit the stock to be unloaded for that purpose.[46] It has been held that the fact that an owner of animals was guilty of contributory negligence in overcrowding a car for their transportation did not relieve the carrier from liability for its negligence in keeping the car, without unloading, an unreasonable length of time at a feeding station.[47] A shipper's failure to pay freight before unloading stock will not defeat the carrier's liability for failure to delay in watering and feeding the animals where it was customary to unload before payment, and the shipper had done so on previous occasions.[48]

Effect of shipper accompanying the stock. The fact that the owner of the stock, or his agent, by arrangement with the carrier, accompanies the animals on the same train does not relieve the carrier from the duty to feed and water them,[49] in the absence of a specific agreement that he would care for the stock,[50] or of a custom known to the shipper and assented to by him.[51] It has been held, on the other hand, that where live stock is accompanied by the shipper, it is his duty to feed and water the animals, if the carrier affords him an opportunity of so doing at suitable places where adequate facilities for such purpose exist,[52] and that even if no such facilities exist at the point at which the live stock is unloaded for that purpose, it is the duty of the shipper to render such assistance as is possible in caring for the animals and mitigating the damage which may be sustained.[53]

Extraordinary diligence

Carrier was chargeable with extraordinary diligence, where sued for damage by failure to feed and water stock for prolonged period—Bugg v Perry & Faircloth, 156 S.E. 708, 42 Ga.App. 523

Intra-state shipment

The law does not require absolutely that the carrier unload, rest, feed, and water live stock en route on an intra-state shipment not subject to the federal statutes relating to such matter, and it will be liable only if it was negligent in not taking this precaution and leaving it to the shipper to do so—Payne v. Parsons, 223 P 618, 97 Okl 168.

Pigeons

It was held, in the absence of an agreement to do so, that an express company transporting live pigeons was not required to feed and water the birds—American Merchants' Union Express Co. v. Phillips, 29 Mich 515

Provision for watering

(1) A carrier is required to make adequate provision for watering cattle shipped—Kirby v Oregon Short Line R Co, 197 P 254, 59 Mont 425

(2) A carrier is under a duty to give a shipment of hogs, during hot weather, sufficient water to drink—McCoy v Wabash Ry Co, 231 N W. 353, 210 Iowa 1075.

Railroad must break continuous confinement of live stock when necessary—Jennings v. Missouri Pac R Co., 134 So 694, 172 La 522.

The failure of the carrier to place a car of mules at an unloading track to permit the shipper to unload and care for the animals or, if it did not want to do this, to feed and water the animals itself, was negligence for which it was liable—St Louis-San Francisco Ry Co v. Otherwise stated

It is the duty of the shipper of live stock or his agent, if either accompanies the shipment, to see that the stock is properly fed, but it is the carrier's duty to see that feed is available at feeding stations when needed—Sheehan v Minneapolis & St L. R Co., 193 N W 597, 46 S D 429 feeding, watering, and resting live stock is ordinarily valid and effective, but under such a contract the carrier will not be absolved from liability for matters under its control or for its own negligence, or if it assumes to perform the duty, fails to assume it although it knows that the stock is unattended, or prevents the shipper from complying with the contract.

As a general rule, subject to some exceptions, a special agreement by the shipper, as a part of the contract of transportation, that he or his agents will attend to feeding, watering, and resting the animals, releases the carrier to that extent from the liability imposed by common law or by statute, and if damage ensues to the animals from lack of such care the carrier cannot be held responsible,[54] provided, as will be discussed in the following subsection, the necessary facilities and opportunity for such care are made available by the carrier. The carrier, however, cannot, without the shipper's consent, impose on him any duty to accompany and to care for the shipment.[55]

Contracts of such a character are ordinarily regarded as valid[56] and not in violation of public policy.[57] Thus, although there is some authority apparently to the contrary,[58] it has been held that constitutional and statutory provisions prohibiting a common carrier from limiting its common-law liability do not prevent it from making such special contracts with shippers,[59] for the reason, it has been said, that such provisions are not intended to prevent freedom of contract as to matters merely incidental to the contract of transportation, and not peculiar or necessary to it.[60] Also, notwithstanding some contrary authority,[61] it has been held that the Carmack amendment, preventing a carrier from stipulating against liability therein provided for, has not the effect of invalidating such contracts.[62]

The assumption of responsibility on the part of the shipper for the care of animals during transportation cannot, however, be extended beyond the terms of the contract expressed or reasonably implied, or held to include matters under the carrier's control or to exempt the carrier from liability for its own negligence.[63] The shipper's default in

Act of conversion by carrier

Where a shipper continued to rely on his contract when the carrier stopped the shipment and wrongfully or erroneously demanded additional freight, instead of electing to treat such act as a conversion, his caretaker was bound to continue to feed and water the live stock pursuant to contract.—Panhandle & S. Default by shipper

It has been held that, where the contract provides that the animals be fed and watered by the shipper or, on his failure to comply with the contract, by the carrier, the failure of the shipper to perform these services is a default on his part, and he cannot recover damages arising therefrom.—Phelps v. In Iowa

(1) A contract whereby the shipper agrees to accompany the shipment of live stock and feed and water it is not invalidated by a statutory prohibition against the limitation of the common-law liability of a carrier and, where the shipper undertakes to accompany the shipment and provide such services, the carrier cannot be charged with liability therefor.—Burgher v. Chicago, etc, R. Co, 75 N.W. 192, 105 Iowa 335—Grieve v. Illinois Cent. R. Co, 74 N.W. 192, 104 Iowa 659.

(2) On the other hand, it has apparently been held that such a contract is invalid and of no effect on the liability of the carrier where the shipper does not accompany the stock, and hence has not assumed performance of the duty.—Wisecarver v. Chicago, etc, R. Co., 119 N.W. 532, 141 Iowa 121—Powers v. Chicago, etc, R. Co, 105 N.W. 345, 130 Iowa 615—10 C.J. p. 98 note 70 [a].

failing to perform the duties required of him by the contract will constitute no defense to the carrier's liability for its default, unless the default of the shipper was one of the causes of the damage.[64] Where the carrier undertakes to feed and water stock notwithstanding a contract imposing this duty on the shipper, it is bound to exercise due care to see that the stock is given suitable food and water.[65] So, where the carrier undertakes and assumes the duty of bedding cars before live stock are loaded and before the contract is signed, it will not be permitted to rely on an exemption stipulated for in the contract imposing the duty of bedding on the shipper.[66] Where a contract for the shipment of live stock required that the shipper accompany the stock, for which purpose he was entitled to free passage, and he failed to accompany the stock to feed and water them, and they were injured, he cannot contend that the carrier failed to issue transportation to him, where he did not request the same.[67]

Where carrier knows that stock is not attended. Although there is some authority to the contrary,[68] a recognized limitation of the general rule is that if the carrier is aware that, notwithstanding the special contract, no one is accompanying the shipment as required thereby, it is bound properly to feed, water, and rest the animals just as though no such contract had been made with the shipper, and it will be liable for loss or injury sustained by its failure to do so.[69] This it is said necessarily results from the rule which denies to the carrier the right to relieve itself by contract of liability for its own negligence.[70] The carrier must in such a case care for the cattle, and look to the shipper for reimbursement.[71]

Where carrier prevents compliance with contract. The rule shifting liability to the shipper, of course, has no application where he is prevented from complying with the contract by the carrier's own act, as by refusing to allow him to accompany the shipment[72] or by performing the duty itself[73] against the shipper's protest.[74]

(2) Duty to Furnish Reasonable Opportunity and Facilities

Although the shipper assumes by contract the duty to feed, water, and rest live stock, the carrier has the duty to afford him reasonable opportunity and facilities for doing so, the shipper not being obliged to procure facilities elsewhere.

Although a special contract requires the shipper to give care and furnish food and water to stock in transit, the carrier is still bound to afford him or his agent reasonable opportunity[75] and facilities[76] for doing so, and it will be liable for loss or injury from its neglect to perform this duty.

This duty includes that of giving notice to the shipper in a reasonable way where such facilities are to be had, although the contract contains a stipulation that the carrier agrees to stop its cars at any of its stations for watering and feeding, when it has facilities for so doing, and whenever requested by the owner, in writing, so to do.[77] If the carrier fails to discharge this duty, any stipulation in the contract requiring a shipper to feed and water stock shipped is unreasonable and void,[78] and the shipper who has undertaken to procure feed and water for the stock is not required to procure it elsewhere.[79] In order to fasten liability on the carrier it is not necessary that there should be a wanton refusal on its part to furnish the necessary facilities.[80]

Where the shipper accompanies the stock, the carrier may rely on him to notify his agents, whenever he thinks it necessary, to unload for feed and water and rest.[81] It has been held, however, that a stipulation in a contract of shipment requiring such notice to be in writing is unreasonable and should not be enforced, and that a failure to grant a verbal request is sufficient on which to predicate a cause of action, where damage results therefrom,[82] and in any event such a stipulation may be waived by the carrier.[83]

(2) State statutes

(1) Federal Twenty-Eight-Hour Law

(a) In general
(b) Effect of contract that shipper care for stock
(c) Effect of shipper accompanying stock
(d) Computation of time of confinement; extension

(a) In General

Under the federal statute providing that live stock be unloaded if confined for greater than a specified period of time, and furnished with feed, water, and rest by the shipper, or, on his default, by the carrier, it is the carrier's duty to furnish the necessary facilities and to see that the stock is cared for as required, and a failure to do so is negligence per se rendering it liable to the shipper except where its noncompliance with the statute is caused by an unavoidable accidental cause.

The common-law duty of a carrier stated in subsection a, supra, is not changed, but merely made certain as to the time and manner of its performance by a federal statute, Comp.St. §§ 8651–8654, 45 U.S.C.A. §§ 71–73, generally known as the Twenty-Eight-Hour Law, which provides in substance that an interstate carrier of animals cannot confine the stock in its cars for a longer period of time than twenty-eight consecutive hours without unloading the same for rest, water, and feeding for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented from doing so by accidental or unavoidable causes, that the twenty-eight hour period of time may be extended to a period of thirty-six hours if written request of the shipper or his agent be made separate and apart from the printed bill of lading or other railroad form, and, further, that animals so unloaded shall be properly fed and watered during such rest by the owner or person in charge or in case of his default by the carrier transporting the stock at the expense of the owner or the custodian, and that the carrier have a lien on the animals for food, care, and water furnished.[84] Notwithstanding a penalty is provid-

Object of statute

(1) The Twenty-Eight-Hour Law has for its main purpose the prevention of cruelty to animals.
Mo.—Bradford v. Hines, 227 S.W. 889, 892, 206 Mo.App. 582—Bradford v. McAdoo, 219 S.W. 92, 202 Mo.App. 412.

ed for a violation of this regulation, see § 484 infra, a failure to comply therewith is negligence per se, rendering the railroad company also liable to the shipper for the resulting injuries to the animals.[85]

The duty to unload, feed, water, and rest animals as required by the statute is a part of the duty of transportation incumbent upon the carrier.[86] It must see to compliance with the statute,[87] and hence it has the right to unload stock for that purpose, whether or not authorized by the shipper, or even against his protest.[88] The statute, although it gives the owner or shipper an option of performing the statutory duty, does not contemplate a divided, dual duty but rather a single, unitary one, which the owner primarily has the right to perform;[89] but if he does not assume it, the carrier must do so.[90] From this it follows that if the shipper does not assume the duty in its entirety, and if it is cast on the railroad, the shipper cannot hamper the railroad with conditions, or by any voluntary part performance on his part add to, or detract from, the railroad's obligation to perform the statutory duty in its entirety.[91]

Under this statute it is the duty of the carrier not only to unload the animals within the stated period, but also to provide reasonably suitable conveniences for feeding, watering, and caring for the animals, and a place reasonably suitable and sufficient to allow the animals to obtain rest;[92] but such facilities need not be owned by the carrier or located on its right of way.[93]

"Although . . . [the statute] makes it the . . [carrier's] duty to provide properly equipped pens for holding the horses while they are being fed, watered, and rested, there is nothing in the statute itself, or in the purpose it is

Although the carrier will, within the terms of the statute, be excused from performing its duty by "storm or other accidental causes," such exception clause must be taken to mean unavoidable accidental causes and an effect attributable to the negligence of the carrier is not an unavoidable cause excusing it from liability.[94] Moreover, even though the transportation is delayed by an unavoidable cause,[95] such as by an act of God,[96] the statute does not relieve the carrier from liability where there is an entire absence of evidence that the cause of delay in any way interfered with the handling of the stock or providing it with food and water and giving it such care as would insure its delivery at destination in good condition.

The statute does not excuse a carrier for keeping animals confined for the length of time specified without feed or water even if it would otherwise be negligent so to do.[97] It has been held, however, that, where the carrier has given a shipment of stock the rest required by the statute, its failure to give further time does not render it liable in the absence of a contract stipulation providing for additional time.[98]

Restriction or waiver. The provisions of the statute cannot be waived except in the manner and on the contingencies specified therein.[99] In other words, the statute operates as a restriction on the right of contract between the shipper and the carrier and this restriction cannot be disregarded and contractual rights built on it; consequently a contract conflicting therewith is void.[1] So, although there are some decisions which apparently have reached the opposite conclusion,[2] it has been held that, inasmuch as the statute makes it obligatory on the carrier properly to care for and to feed and water stock in transit if the shipper or custodian fails so to do, the carrier cannot by any contract relieve itself of liability for a noncompliance with the statutory requirements.[3]

(b) Effect of Contract That Shipper Care for Stock

A carrier contracting that the shipper attend and provide for the animals in transit remains under the duty to furnish the shipper the necessary information, opportunity, and facilities to do so, aside from any request therefor by him, and, if it knows that the animals are unattended, it must furnish the care required by the statute.

It has been held that a carrier contracting that the shipper shall attend and care for animals dur-intended to serve, which even suggests that these pens must be on the . . . [carrier's] right of way, or that . . . [it] must own them The . . . [carrier], therefore, could have performed . . . [its] duty of providing pens, by maintaining them either on . . . [its] own land or on the land of others, or by hiring them whenever . . . [it] had occasion to use them In other words, the thing a carrier must do to avoid liability is to provide suitable pens It is immaterial who owns them, [or] the land on which they stand."—Terrill v. Payne, supra.

Shipment over connecting lines

The fact that the stock was shipped over connecting lines, and that the connecting carrier refused to receive the stock from the initial carrier, will not exonerate it from the liability imposed by the statute, and it makes no difference that the shipper may have a remedy against the connecting carrier also for refusing to accept and to unload the stock.—Texas, etc., Co v Berchfield, 46 S W. 900, 19 Tex Civ App. 228.

The statute imposes the absolute duty to feed and water the stock at the expiration of the thirty-six hour release period upon the carrier, irrespective of any contract with the shipper shifting the duty.—Hines v. Morgan, 218 S.W. 672, 142 Ark. 272.

ing transportation remains under the duty to furnish adequate facilities for feeding and watering stock,[4] and to provide the shipper with reasonable information[5] and opportunity[6] for performing the services he has undertaken; and it will be liable for the damage resulting from its failure or refusal to do so. The failure of the owner or caretaker to request or demand such opportunity does not, as a matter of law, excuse the carrier from liability[7] inasmuch as the statute provides for the performance of the duty by the carrier on the default of the shipper.[8] Notwithstanding a contract obligating the shipper to comply with the duty, if he fails to accompany the shipment to perform it, the carrier must unload, feed, and rest the animals within the requisite time the same as though no contract had existed.[9]

(c) Effect of Shipper Accompanying Stock

Although the shipper accompanying the animals in transit has the primary duty to feed, water, and rest them in compliance with statute, the carrier is obligated to provide facilities and undertake this duty if the shipper fails or refuses to do so; and, it must unload the stock for that purpose even in the absence of the shipper's request.

Although it has been held to be the rule that where the shipper or his agent in fact accompanies the shipment, it is primarily his duty to comply with the statute,[10] and a refusal to perform or assist in the performance of the duty constitutes a defense in an action against the carrier for unskillful handling of the live stock, especially where a contract provision exempts the carrier from liability for loss due to the act or default of the shipper,[11] the carrier must ordinarily feed, water, and rest the animals if the shipper or his agent accompanying the shipment fails to do so,[12] it being held that the general rule stated in subsection a, supra, that the presence of a caretaker does not relieve the carrier of its duty, in the absence of a specific agreement that the shipper would care for the stock, is applicable under the federal statute.[13] This duty of a carrier is not dependent on any demand of the caretaker that the statute be complied with, and his failure to request that the stock be unloaded for that purpose is no defense to the shipper's action for damages,[14] at least in the absence of an agreement placing the duty of feeding and watering the stock on the shipper.[15] In any case, the carrier is obligated to make available proper and adequate facilities for the performance of the statutory requirements.[16]

(d) Computation of Time of Confinement; Extension

Under provision of statute to that effect, the time of confinement on connecting roads is included in estimating the time of prohibited confinement. The shipper's privilege, under provision of the statute, to extend the time of confinement from twenty-eight to thirty-six hours, by written request therefor, does not obligate the carrier to confine the stock as long as twenty-eight hours.

Under a provision of the statute that, in estimating the prohibited confinement, the time during which the animals have been confined on connecting roads from which they are received should be included, a carrier is guilty of a violation of the statute if it fails to give animals rest, feed, and water when the period of twenty-eight hours from the time they were last fed expires, although they were in the possession of a connecting carrier during part of that period.[17]

The right vested in a shipper by the statute to extend the period of confinement of animals from twenty-eight to thirty-six hours is a valuable one, and the duty is imposed on the carrier to afford a reasonable opportunity for its exercise.[18] The power of the shipper to extend the time limit of confinement is not, however, a privilege ipso facto to impose an obligation of the carrier to keep the stock confined as long as twenty-eight hours but only a privilege to extend the time from twenty-eight to thirty-six hours.[19]

The requirement of the statute that the shipper's request for an extension be written and "separate and apart from any printed bill of lading, or other railroad form," is sufficiently complied with by a request on a separate railroad form which contains the request alone,[20] or, it has been held, by a written indorsement in the blank margin of the bill of lading.[21] A request signed by the shipper without consideration to himself or detriment to the carrier for an extension of time may be revoked by him.[22] Where a railroad company failed to maintain pens for unloading stock so as to comply with the act, and a conductor of a stock train stated to the shipper that, unless he would sign a written release extending the time to thirty-six hours, he would unload the cattle without pens, and the shipper signed the release to prevent such unloading, the release was not invalid as having been obtained by duress of property.[23]

(2) State Statutes

Under various state statutes regulating the feeding, watering, and resting of live stock, the carrier may be required to furnish adequate facilities therefor, but the duty of actually feeding and watering the stock may be shifted by contract to the shipper, and the carrier will be relieved of responsibility therefor even though the shipper fails to accompany the stock to render this service.

State statutes, similar to the federal statute considered in subdivision c (1) of this section, which provide for the feeding and watering of stock in transit, have for their purpose the prevention of cruelty to animals and the protection of the public health from diseased animals;[24] they do not

Purpose of provision

"While . . . one of the purposes of the permission to extend the time of confinement upon a request was that the person in custody during the transportation might provide for an unanticipated emergency . . . another of the purposes of the permission was to enable those owners, whose cattle were shipped from points more than 28 and less than 36 hours' run from their destination, or from pens suitably equipped for unloading, watering, feeding, and resting them, to avoid unloading them on the way. It is much more cruel and injurious to cattle and sheep to unload and reload them than it is to continue their confinement 8 hours when the 28-hour limit is reached"—McGinley v. Union Pac R Co, 263 N.W. 393, 399, 129 Neb 855.

Liability for resulting delay

Where terminal carrier was advised when shipment was turned over to it that shipment was for certain market, and conductor, when inquired of as to when train would arrive at destination, made answer disclosing that ample time remained to complete movement of cattle before expiration of twenty-eight-hour limit, but carrier's yardmaster at intermediate point had cattle unloaded for feed, water, and rest, because of carrier's rule requiring ten hours from leaving time at that point to make destination, without informing caretaker in charge or giving caretaker opportunity to execute request for extension of time to thirty-six hours, the carrier was negligent in so unloading the stock, and liable for loss resulting from the delay—McGinley v. Union Pac. R. Co., 263 N.W. 393, 129 Neb. 855.

19. In Missouri

(1) The rule stated in the text has been enunciated—Bradford v. Hines, 227 S.W. 889, 206 Mo App 582.

(2) It was held, apparently contrary to this rule, that where a shipper, to escape contagion at a point en route, desired more time for transit without unloading than twenty-eight hours, by giving his written request for extension of time to thirty-six hours, he became entitled to such an extension as would cause unloading not earlier than some time between twenty-eight and thirty-six hours, and that a lawful contract to that effect resulted, which gave rise to a cause of action in the shipper if violated by the carrier—Bradford v McAdoo, 219 S.W. 92, 202 Mo App. 412

(3) It has been said that the case of Bradford v. McAdoo, supra, is distinguishable on the ground that the court was not dealing with the question whether the contract alone created a binding obligation on the carrier not to unload within any specified lawful time but whether such obligation was created by a custom whereby the attachment of an agreement extending the twenty-eight hour period constituted an agreement by the carrier not to unload before that time—Bradford v. Hines, supra.

apply to interstate shipments.[25] Under a statute which imposes on the carrier the duty to feed and water the stock, the carrier may be required to furnish places where the stock may be unloaded, watered, and fed without injury in any kind of weather if the cars in which they are transported are not properly constructed for that purpose.[26] A statute of such a character authorizes the carrier to contract with the shipper of animals that he shall attend to the feeding and watering of the stock himself.[27] Under a statute which imposes penalties on the carrier for failure to unload, feed, and water stock as provided therein,[28] or which imposes such a duty on the carrier unless it provides otherwise by special contract,[29] the failure of the shipper to accompany and take care of the animals as required by his special contract relieves the carrier from the duty to feed and water, as concerns its liability to the shipper. On the other hand, the shipper's failure to accompany and care for the animals as called for by the contract of shipment does not absolve the carrier from liability under a statute providing that the stock be fed and watered by the shipper or in his default by the carrier.[30]

d. Time and Manner of Complying with Duty

In compliance with its duty, the carrier may be required to stop the train, or set out the cars at an intermediate stopping place, or place the cars at a convenient place for unloading. The carrier, however, is not obligated to accede to the shipper's request for the performance of the duty, where the demand is unreasonable, and ordinarily the times when, and the places for, rest and refreshment are to be left to its judgment.

If reasonable opportunity for feeding and watering is not otherwise afforded, the carrier should stop the train for that purpose.[31] If unloading is necessary, it is the duty of the carrier to place the cars where the stock can be unloaded by the persons in charge.[32] At the request of the shipper it is the duty of the carrier to set out the car containing the animals at an intermediate stopping place, if essential to avoid injury from continuance of the transportation.[33]

Where, however, cattle are brought to the carrier for shipment in apparently good condition, the carrier is not liable for failing to furnish opportunities to water them before commencing transportation, unless notified of the necessity thereof.[34] It has also been held that the times when, and places where, rest and refreshment may be necessary must be left to the judgment of the carrier, and not the shipper, who cannot demand of the carrier that it feed the live stock at any particular time or place;[35] this is so notwithstanding the contract of shipment requires the shipper to feed, water, and care for the stock at his own risk and expense.[36] While the carrier is bound to afford proper facilities and reasonable opportunities for rest, feed, and water, it is not required to supply these on a mere demand of the shipper without regard to the reasonableness or necessity of such demand.[37] So the duty of a carrier whether by contract or rule of law to exercise proper care for the preservation of live stock in transportation does not require it to permit the shipper to unload the stock for rest and feeding for a considerable period of time in order to improve them for market instead of merely to preserve

Effect of quarantine regulations

A statute which provides that railroad companies shall not confine animals in cars for more than twenty-eight consecutive hours, is not superseded by an order of the board of cattle commissioners forbidding a railroad from unloading any neat cattle for any purpose whatever except upon written permit from the board, at any place except certain designated quarantine stations—Hendrick v. their physical condition, and the right of the shipper to such a privilege must be expressed in his contract of shipment.[38] On the other hand, where the carrier has established a usage of unloading at a particular place for the proper care and necessary preservation of certain live stock, the shipper, in the absence of notice of a change of usage, has the right to expect that such usage on the part of the carrier will be observed, and if it is not observed, resulting in loss to him, he may hold the carrier responsible therefor.[39]

While the carrier's duty does not require it to keep water on hand in its pens at all times and under all circumstances,[40] such duty is not discharged by stopping at places where there are no such facilities, or where neither food nor water is obtainable.[41] Where the carrier undertakes to rest and water sheep as required by statute, it must furnish wholesome water, and it will be liable for injuries to the animals caused by the drinking of unwholesome water,[42] notwithstanding it had no knowledge of the fact that the water was of such a character.[43] The carrier's duty is not discharged by showing that unwholesome water furnished was the water offered by that section of the country where it appears that it was not impossible, by reasonable efforts, to furnish wholesome water for the stock.[44]

§ 65. Duty of Complying with Quarantine Regulations

A carrier in transporting live stock has the duty to comply with quarantine regulations; and, as part of the service required by the shipping contract, it must dip animals where this is required by law, although some authority holds this to be a duty of the shipper in the absence of special contract to the contrary.

A carrier is under the duty to comply with quarantine regulations concerning the transportation of live stock.[45] Although it has been held that, in the absence of special contract,[46] the duty of dipping cattle in compliance with quarantine regulations before transportation to points outside a quarantine area is no part of the contract of shipment and rests primarily with the shipper,[47] it has also been held that it is part of the service required by the shipping contract,[48] and that in performing such service the carrier must exercise ordinary care.[49] A carrier which, intending to comply with quarantine regulations, refuses to receive cattle for transportation unless tuberculin tested or castrated is not liable for damage to the animals caused by the shipper's compliance with the carrier's demand.[50] Likewise, notwithstanding a federal statute permitting the interstate transportation of animals from a quarantined area for the purpose of immediate slaughter, without dipping, a carrier which refuses to accept

Inspection at yard nearest quarantine line

The quarantine regulations requiring carriers to unload horses brought into the state from points west of the Missouri river for inspection, unless copy of a certificate of health is attached to the waybill, do not require a railroad company to unload a shipment of horses at the yards nearest the Missouri river, but only at the yards nearest the river upon its line.—Marks & Shields v. Separate contract

Under an interstate shipment of cattle, dipping of the cattle is covered in the contract of carriage, and is not a proper subject of a separate contract.—Ezell v. Midland Valley R. Co., 174 P. 781, 73 Okl. 40.

49. Okl.—Schaff v. Hudgins, 221 P. 90, 96 Okl. 173, certiorari denied 44 S.Ct. 454, 264 U.S. 595, 68 L.Ed. 867.—Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Williamson, 180 P. 961, 75 Okl. 36.

Negligence measured by terms of contract

The question of negligence in the performance of the carrier's duty to dip cattle in compliance with quarantine regulations must be measured by the terms of the shipping contract.—Schaff v. Hudgins, 221 P. 90, 96 Okl. 173, certiorari denied 44 S.Ct. 454, 264 U.S. 595, 68 L.Ed. 867.—Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Skinner, 160 P. 875, 61 Okl. 189.

Unnecessary dipping

Where cattle shipped into another state had been inspected and a proper certificate of inspection issued, and the carrier on its own initiative caused them to be dipped again at their destination, the carrier is liable to the shipper for the expense.—Robinson & Reynolds v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 112 S.E. 389, 28 Ga.App. 484.

such shipment without dipping is not liable in damages for injuries occasioned by the shipper's dipping of the cattle where a state quarantine regulation so required before the cattle could be tendered for transportation.[51]

Contributory negligence of shipper. The refusal of the shipper to consent to the confinement of his cattle longer than twenty-eight hours, necessitating their being unloaded in infected pens and nonquarantined territory, is contributory negligence precluding a recovery for injuries caused by improper dipping, where noninfected territory could have been reached in two hours over the twenty-eight-hour period, which would have obviated the necessity of dipping.[52]

§ 66. Care Required in Respect of Sick or Pregnant Animals

The carrier, in the absence of negligence on its part, is not liable for damage resulting from the sickness or pregnancy of animals in transit.

A carrier of live stock is not liable, except in case of negligence proximately contributing thereto, for damages occasioned by sickness of the animals.[53] So, in the absence of notice or of facts sufficient to charge a carrier with knowledge that animals shipped are pregnant, such condition is a hidden or concealed defect, and the carrier in handling the shipment will not be charged with greater care than that ordinarily exercised in handling such animals that are not pregnant;[54] and where the carrier carries such animals without negligence on his part there can be no liability for injuries due to such causes.[55] On the other hand, where, although not expressly informed of the fact by the shipper, the pregnant condition of an animal is plainly apparent to the carrier, or plainly inferable from facts known to it, the carrier will be liable for injuries caused by its negligence in not handling the animal with due care under the circumstances.[56]

Mistakes of veterinarian. A carrier transporting a horse is not liable for mistakes made by a veterinarian it secured to treat the horse, unless it failed to exercise reasonable care in selecting him.[57]

I. DUTY AS TO LOADING AND UNLOADING

§ 67. Inanimate Freight

a. In general
b. Where shipper assumes duty

a. In General

The carrier ordinarily has the duty to load and unload freight, except that it is not required to unload bulky freight shipped in carload lots or cars delivered off its premises.

The carrier is bound to furnish proper facilities for the loading and unloading of freight.[58] It is not, however, required to establish facilities to accommodate each patron, and it has the right to load or unload cars where its facilities or appliances for such work are located.[59]

Subject to qualifications hereinafter stated, it is also the primary duty of the carrier properly to load and unload freight delivered to it for transportation, and it will generally be liable for loss

Animal accustomed to shipment

Although a common carrier is not an insurer of animals against injury or death caused by their nature which could not be guarded against by foresight and vigilance, where a mare was heavy with foal and accustomed to being shipped by car, the evidence may be such as to warrant a jury in finding that the facts did not bring the case within the rule.—Kingsbury v. Chicago & A. R Co., 213 Ill.App. 439.

Notice at time of shipment not essential

In order to render the carrier liable for depreciation in market value, due to abortions caused by the carrier's negligence, it is not essential that the carrier should have had notice at the time of the shipment that the animals were pregnant.

Accessibility to cars or injury to goods sustained in the performance of this duty.[60] The company ordinarily cannot by any regulation impose its duty on the shipper, nor require, as a condition of transportation, that the shipper shall enter into a contract to perform this duty himself,[61] although, as appears in subsection b infra, the shipper may voluntarily bind himself, either by an express or implied agreement, to do the loading or unloading himself. It has been held that, even though the carrier in loading uses appliances furnished by the shipper himself it will be liable for injuries resulting from defects in the appliances, if the appliances were under the exclusive control of the carrier and there was no assumption of responsibility on the part of the shipper.[62] Although the shipping contract contains a provision that the carrier shall not be liable for loss or injury occurring on a connecting line, such provisions will not exempt it from liability for loss or injury caused by its improperly loading on its cars goods offered for transportation.[63]

Bulky freight shipped in carload lots. By custom or usage, an exception to the general rule stated above usually obtains in the case of bulky freight in carload lots. In the case of shipments of this character, the carrier is not required to remove such freight from the car, but may deliver the car in a safe and convenient position for unloading at the place designated by the contract, or, in the absence of such designation, on its sidetrack in the usual and customary place for unloading by consignees.[64]

Cars delivered off carrier's premises. The general rule requiring the carrier to load and unload shipments is also not applicable to a case where the cars are not to be loaded or unloaded at the station or on the lands and tracks of the carrier. Where cars are delivered on a private siding off the land of the carrier, it is under no obligation to unload them.[65]

Reloading in transit. Where a car was loaded by the shipper with a definite design to separate goods of different character, the carrier is liable for loss resulting from a negligent failure to maintain the separation in unloading and transferring the contents of the car to another car during transportation.[66] A carrier, receiving a shipment without notifying the shipper of quarantine regulations preventing movement of the shipment in open cars through certain areas of the route designated, must reload the shipment so as to conform to quarantine regulations.[67]

Weighing. Under a statute requiring a carrier to weigh grain accepted for shipment in bulk, on loading the same the duty is not limited to those cases where the weighing is requested by the shipper, or where less than carload lots are shipped.[68]

b. Where Shipper Assumes Duty

Generally, if the shipper assumes the duty of loading and unloading, the carrier will not be liable for loss resulting from defective performance. The carrier must afford the shipper a reasonable opportunity to load and unload.

Although there is authority to the contrary,[69] it is the general rule that if the shipper voluntarily assumes the duty of loading or unloading,[70] as under a special contract to that effect,[71] the carrier is ordinarily absolved from responsibility therefor, and will not be liable for loss or injury resulting from an improper performance of the duty, especially where the injuries result from the shipper's misrepresentation of the manner in which he loaded the goods on the carrier's cars;[72] but such improper loading will be available as a defense only where it is the direct cause of the damage to the goods.[73] As otherwise expressed, the rule is that if, after undertaking the duty of loading, the shipper fails to see that the car is properly prepared for the transportation of the particular article which he is loading, he assumes responsibility for all defects in loading which are necessarily invisible to the agent of the carrier who accepts the freight, or which he cannot discern by ordinary observation or such inspection as he can readily make.[74]

Draining gasoline from car

A railway company having nothing to do with loading an automobile on a freight car and preparing it for shipment, except to inspect and approve the manner of its being fastened, was not liable for the loss thereof by fire by reason of the negligence of the shipper's agent in draining gasoline therefrom in proximity to a lighted lantern, although it did not require such drainage, a bill of lading had been signed, and one of its employees got a can for and expected to receive some of the gasoline—Train v. Failure to use blocks

Where the shipper's employees, who had run a traction engine onto the carrier's loading platform, for the purpose of loading it on a flat car, although they saw that the car was lower than the loading platform and discussed what to do, attempted to run the engine from the platform onto the car, without the use of blocks, which were at hand, he could not recover for damages due to engine falling from car.—Pedelty Thresher Co. v Chicago, M. & St P Ry. Rate for particular mode of shipment

A carrier is not liable for damages to oranges, shipped under "Shipper's Load and Count" bill of lading, caused by improper loading of oranges in mesh bags, on theory that carrier, by promulgating tariff rate for shipment of oranges in mesh bags, tacitly represented that such manner of shipping oranges was safe and impliedly assumed common-law liability of carriers as to oranges—Robinson v New York Cent. Although the carrier is not called on to see that the shipper has properly performed his duty in this regard,[75] it has been held that, if the improper loading is apparent to the ordinary observation of the carrier's servants, the carrier cannot escape liability on the ground of the shipper's defective loading,[76] and that it is its duty in such case to refrain from transporting the goods until the defects and deficiencies in loading have been remedied.[77] On the other hand, it has been held that improper loading by the shipper constitutes a complete defense, regardless of whether or not the shipment was inspected by the carrier's employees,[78] and that the fact that the carrier's employees knew before starting that the goods were improperly loaded is immaterial,[79] the carrier being under no duty, in such case, to reload the cars.[80]

The defense that the car was improperly loaded by the shipper is available whether the shipper or the consignee brings the action;[81] and the negligence of the shipper is imputable to the consignee and will bar a recovery by either.[82]

Appliance under control of carrier. Where the carrier provides a crane, to be operated by its own employees, for the convenience of shippers in loading heavy and bulky freight, it is liable for damages to the freight caused by negligent operation of the crane by its employee, notwithstanding it makes no charge for the use of the crane.[83]

Duty of shipper to remove within reasonable time. While a carrier owes to a shipper the duty to furnish him with reasonable facilities and opportunity for unloading goods shipped in carload lots, the shipper must exercise reasonable diligence in unloading, and is not entitled to use the car as a store in which to carry on his business of selling the goods shipped on payment of demurrage charges.[84] The carrier is not liable for damages to the goods shipped, resulting from its refusal to permit its car to be used for such purpose.[85]

Reasonable opportunity for loading. Under a statute which authorizes a carrier to regulate the time and manner for movements of freight, the duty rests on the carrier to establish such rules

"Improper loading constitutes ordinarily such a fault on the part of the shipper as will relieve a common carrier from its common-law liability for the safe delivery of goods it undertakes to carry, especially where the faulty loading, in carload lots, consists of internal defects of which the carrier does not know and from which the loss or damage ensues to the goods in the ordinary course of handling and transportation."—American Cotton Oil Co. v. Defective valve in tank car

(1) Where consignee of cotton oil furnished its own tank cars for shipment, and it was not apparent that inner valve in car had not been closed, railroad company, although bound to exercise high degree of care, cannot be held liable for loss of oil resulting from failure to close valve securely, notwithstanding outer cap might have prevented escape, had it not been defective.—Alabama & V. Presumed knowledge of patent faults

"Even where the shipper is to do his own loading, the carrier who accepts the freight for shipment assumes the obligation and liabilities of a common carrier . . . and, in the absence of a false representation or deceitful conduct on the part of the shipper with reference to the manner of loading, the carrier, on issuing its bill of lading for the goods as in apparent good order, is presumed to acquire knowledge of any patent fault or delinquency in the manner of loading which a casual inspection of the freight thus tendered would render apparent."—Central of Georgia Ry. as will afford the shipper a reasonable opportunity for loading and transporting.[86] It is also the carrier's duty, apparently independent of any statute, to afford the consignee a reasonable opportunity to unload.[87]

Violations of tariff regulation. A carrier which accepts for shipment goods not loaded in compliance with its regulations does so under its full common-law liability,[88] and it is only where the shipper's violation of the regulation is the proximate cause of the damage to the shipment that it can be availed of as a defense by the carrier.[89]

Under a tariff regulation requiring the owner to unload a carload shipment, neither the consignee nor the carrier's agent can lawfully agree that the carrier shall unload the car.[90] Such a tariff rule, however, is not violated by the imposition of liability on the carrier for the negligence of its crane operator in unloading freight, where the interstate transportation had been completed, and further transportation to the point of unloading was not under the tariff but under a new and separate service.[91]

§ 68. Live Stock

The duty of a carrier to provide proper facilities for loading and unloading is treated in § 69 infra, and the duty to load and unload live stock is treated in § 70 infra.

§ 69. Furnishing Facilities for Loading and Unloading

The carrier is bound to furnish safe and adequate facilities for the loading and unloading of live stock in transportation and will be liable for loss resulting from defective equipment, even where the shipper has by contract assumed the duty of loading and unloading the stock, unless the shipper knew of the unsafe condition of the facilities and nevertheless undertook the unloading

As an essential part of the duty of transportation, it is the duty of a carrier of live stock to provide safe and proper facilities and safe and proper places for loading and unloading stock delivered to it,[92] and it will be liable for loss or injury to animals sustained while being loaded or unloaded because of the insufficiency of the facilities or want of safety of places furnished.[93] This duty, as included within the duty of transporta-

10 C.J. p. 104 note 42.

Contributory negligence

Where the evidence showed that the stock pens and chutes of defendant railroad were in bad condition but had been used continually by stock men, it has been held that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to load stock through them.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Cowan, 9 Tenn.App. 158.

Insufficient facilities

Where a shipper, pursuant to invitation, tendered his cattle for shipment at the time specified, and because of insufficient facilities, such as cattle pens, he was compelled to load the same prematurely under the direction of the carrier's agent, and the cattle had to stand in the cars an unnecessarily long time before the cars were moved, he could recover for the loss sustained thereby.—Missouri & N.A. Ry. Co. v. Potts, 10 S.W.2d 515, 178 Ark. 334.—Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Butler, 200 S.W. 144, 132 Ark. 37, L.R.A. 1918C 537.

Stock pens and chutes

(1) Stock pens and chutes provided by a railroad for the loading of stock must be kept in a reasonably safe condition, and a failure to do so constitutes negligence on the part of the railroad rendering it lia-

tion provided for by statute, is nondelegable, and if agents are employed to perform it the liability remains with the carrier just the same.[94] On the other hand, a carrier owes no duty to furnish loading facilities to the shipper for purposes other than that of immediate transportation, such as for assembling and feeding stock preparatory to shipment, and, where its facilities are used for that purpose by the shipper without its consent, it is obliged only to refrain from wantonly or maliciously injuring the stock.[95]

Effect of contract shifting duty of loading and unloading. Notwithstanding the existence of a contract which imposes on the shipper the duty of loading and unloading, the carrier is bound to furnish suitable and safe facilities for loading and unloading, and it will be liable for loss or injuries sustained through a neglect of this duty,[96] unless the shipper knew of the unsafe condition of the appliance and nevertheless undertook to unload his stock,[97] assuming the risk of the injury.[98]

§ 70. Loading and Unloading

a. In general
b. Under contract shifting duty to shipper

a. In General

It is the primary duty of the carrier to load and unload live stock and it will be liable for loss or injury resulting therefrom, whether due to its negligence or not, notwithstanding the shipper's participation therein. It will not, however, be liable for injuries resulting from negligent loading or unloading by the shipper.

In the absence of a contrary agreement or understanding, see infra subsection b, it is the primary duty of a carrier, as an incident to the service of transportation,[99] to load and unload live stock delivered to it for shipment,[1] and ordinarily it will be liable for loss or injury sustained in the performance of this duty.[2] This liability, it appears, is not limited to injuries caused by the carrier's negligence inasmuch as its liability with respect

ble for injuries to the stock resulting therefrom

(2) So, where horses to be shipped were overheated in a "cutting out" process made necessary by the railroad's negligence in permitting water troughs in a loading pen to overflow, rendering such pen muddy, the road was liable for consequent injuries to the horses in transit.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Culwell, Tex.Civ.App., 216 S.W. 457.

Unloading within reasonable time

It was the duty of the carrier to furnish facilities for unloading horses accepted by it for shipment within a reasonable time after they reached their destination.—Sheehan v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 193 N.W. 597, 46 S.D. 429.

Unloading at yard away from tracks

Where a carrier, required to unload stock in transit, desires to furnish a yard away from its tracks, it assumes the duty of making the transfer from the cars to the yard.—Sheehan v. Minneapolis & St. Louis R. Co., 193 N.W. 597, 46 S.D. 429.—10 C.J. p 104 note 46 [b].

Tex.—Massey v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., Civ.App., 200 S.W. 409.
10 C.J. p 104 note 46.

Care required

(1) The servant of the carrier must use the care required in dealing with each particular animal, reference being had to its instincts and habits.—Jones v. Memphis, etc., Packet Co., Miss., 31 So. 201.

(2) The carrier must exercise a high degree of care to prevent animals from injuring themselves while being loaded, considering their propensity to become frightened.—Alexander v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., 129 So. 419, 14 La.App. 245.

Loading at rear end of train

Where cattle were injured as a result of jolting caused by a head-on collision, the fact that they were loaded at the rear end of the train could not be made the basis of a recovery on the ground of negligence in so loading them, although cattle of another at the front end of the train were not injured.—Wichita Valley Ry. Co. v. Baldwin, Tex.Civ.App., 263 S.W. 1090.

Particular acts held negligent

(1) Carrier's removing loading bridge while mules in car were restless, with result that one slipped over edge and injured leg.—Alexander v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., 129 So. 419, 14 La.App. 245.

(2) Failure of carrier's inspector, being veterinary, present when mule cut leg while being loaded, to disinfect injury.—Alexander v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., supra

(3) Where the carrier loaded stock, a failure to separate large from small cattle constituted im-

to the shipment is that of an insurer,[3] except, as indicated in § 79 infra, as to loss or injuries due to the peculiar nature and propensity of the animals. Liability for the negligent overloading of live stock remains with the carrier notwithstanding participation in the loading by the shipper where he or his agent merely assisted therein under control of the carrier,[4] and the duty of the carrier to unload stock safely is not avoided by the fact that the consignee's servant participated in the unloading.[5] That the carrier is required by the Twenty-Eight-Hour Law to break the continued transportation of live stock does not justify unloading the stock in unsuitable pens.[6]

Negligence of the shipper. As an apparent exception to the general rule of liability stated above, it has been held that, irrespective of any contract by which the shipper assumes the risk of loading and unloading his stock,[7] the carrier is not liable for injuries incurred by the stock as a consequence of improper loading or unloading, where such injuries resulted from the negligent performance of that service by the shipper.[8] Moreover, for the carrier to escape responsibility, it is not necessary that the shipper's negligence have been the sole proximate cause of the injury to the animals.[9] It has been held, however, that although the shipper was negligent in overloading the stock and thus caused injury to them, the carrier could not escape liability on this ground where it had knowledge or might have known of the condition of the car as to the loading when it received it for transportation.[10]

Reasonable regulations for loading. Under a statute which authorizes a carrier to regulate the time and manner for the movement of live stock, the duty rests upon it to establish such rules as will afford the shipper a reasonable opportunity for loading and transporting.[11]

b. Under Contract Shifting Duty to Shipper

The carrier may by contract shift the duty of loading and unloading live stock to the shipper and such a contract is generally held to release it from liability for loss resulting from defective loading unknown to it; but, notwithstanding such contract, the carrier will be liable if it fails to afford the shipper a reasonable time and opportunity for loading or unloading or, ordinarily, if it in fact assumes that duty itself.

It is generally held that by special contract the duty of loading and unloading may be shifted from the carrier to the shipper, in which event the carrier, subject to exceptions herein stated, is not liable for loss or injury to the shipment sustained in the performance of this duty, or resulting from and after the improper performance thereof by the shipper.[12] Such a contract is not invalproper loading, rendering it liable for resulting injuries, especially in view of the fact that it required that this be done where the shipper himself loaded the stock—Ker Texada v Texas & P. Ry. Co., 133 So. 415, 16 La.App 66.

Default by shipper

Failure of the shipper to comply with a contract requiring that the loading and unloading of the stock be attended to by him, or, on his id[13] as exonerating the carrier from exercising ordinary care.[14] Accordingly, where, by the contract of shipment, the duty of loading the animals on the cars is imposed on the shipper, and loss or injury results from his overloading the cars, the carrier is not liable,[15] at least where it has no notice of such overloading.[16]

On the other hand, it has been held that, where the stock as loaded by the shipper is accepted by the carrier, the latter assumes all the liabilities of a common carrier, in the absence of any misrepresentation or deceit on the part of the shipper as to the loading,[17] although it will not be liable if it foregoes inspection of the loading in reliance on the shipper's professed competency in the performance of this function.[18] A contract shifting the duty does not preclude the shipper from recovering damages based on the carrier's refusal to allow the stock to be unloaded in transit, although such contract provided that the stock should not be unloaded unless absolutely necessary.[19] Where the contract places on the shipper the duty of unloading live stock, the carrier must at least afford him a reasonable time and opportunity for doing so, and a failure in this respect will render the carrier liable for resulting damages.[20] As otherwise expressed, the management and control of trains is in the carrier's own hands, and the facilities for loading and unloading along the route are its property, and it cannot by contract release itself from liability for a failure to exercise control of its property so as to allow the shipper to discharge the duties which he has assumed.[21] Also, as appears from § 69 supra, such a contract failure to do so, by the carrier, constitutes a default on his part ordinarily preventing him from recovering damages arising therefrom.—Phelps v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 213 P. 610, 66 Mont. 198, certiorari dismissed Great Northern Ry Co v. Galbreath Cattle Co., 44 S.Ct. 334, 264 U.S. 571, 68 L.Ed. 855, reversed on other grounds 46 S.Ct. 439, 271 U.S. 99, 70 L.Ed. 854

Separation of hogs from cattle

Where shipper assumes duty of loading live stock at own risk and subject to certain regulations in bill of lading requiring separation of hogs from cattle, carrier would not ordinarily be liable for damages incurred by noncompliance with such regulations.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v Griner & Rustin, 127 S.E. 878, 33 Ga.App 705.

The duty of unloading may be imposed on the shipper by special contract.—Davis v. Simmons, Tex.Civ. App., 240 S.W. 970, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Where a shipper was negligent in failing to unload live stock on arrival as required by the contract, so that the stock was injured, he could not recover for such injury.—Chicago, R. I. & G Ry. Co. v. Pavillard, Tex.Civ App., 187 S.W. 998.

Overloading due to small car

Notwithstanding the carrier furnished a thirty-six foot car instead of a forty foot car as requested, the shipper could not recover for damages due to overloading of live stock in such car where the contract relieved the carrier of liability therefor in the absence of negligence on its part, and the shipper's agent loaded the stock into the car furnished.

18. Ark.—Fordyce v. McFlynn, 19 S. W. 961, 56 Ark 424, 429.
"By the terms of the contract, the plaintiffs [shippers] undertook to furnish and load the cars for the carriage of their animals; they thereby represented themselves as competent to do the entire work of loading, and if they did it carelessly and thereby caused the injury complained of, the defendants would not be liable, although it appeared that there was a general duty resting upon the conductor to examine trains under his control and see that they were properly loaded. If such duty existed generally, its performance in this case was excused by the plaintiffs And if the conductor, relying upon their professed competency and the careful performance of their undertaking, refrained from making the examination necessary to detect their incompetency or neglect, the carrier is not liable for injuries occasioned by either"—Fordyce v. McFlynn, 19 S.W. 961, 56 Ark 424, 429.

Placement of car at unloading chutes

Where shipment contract required shipper to unload the cattle, it will be assumed that it was carrier's duty to place the car at the unloading chutes, and that it was then the duty of the stockyards company to unload them, acting as agent for shipper—McMickle v. Wabash R. Co, Mo App., 209 S.W. 611.

Failure to hold engine as agreed

Where the conductor in charge of a train agreed to give the shipper reasonable time to procure horses to remove from pens stock already unloaded, in order to make room for the other stock still on the cars, the carrier was liable for failing to hold available an engine which was necessary to the unloading of the stock during the reasonable time so granted.—Davis v. Simmons, Tex.Civ.App., 240 S.W. 970, dismissed for want of jurisdiction does not absolve the carrier from a loss or injury which results from its failure to provide a proper place and suitable facilities for loading and unloading.

Carrier's assumption of duty notwithstanding contract. A stipulation in a contract of shipment which requires the shipper to load and unload his stock is inoperative and has no application where the carrier in fact assumes the duty notwithstanding the contract, and it will be liable for loss or injury sustained in the performance of such duty.[22] Under these circumstances there is a waiver of the provisions of the contract imposing the duty of loading and unloading on the shipper.[23] It seems, however, that under a freight classification of the interstate commerce commission providing that any assistance rendered by an employee of the carrier in loading and unloading be construed as purely voluntary and as the agent of the shipper, the carrier cannot be held responsible for its employees' acts in unloading and caring for stock on the failure of the shipper to meet the shipment.[24]

J. LIABILITY OF CARRIER FOR LOSS OR INJURY

1. At Common Law

§ 71. Statement of, and Reasons for, Rule

Subject to certain exceptions, a common carrier is absolutely liable under the common law for loss or injury to goods received for carriage.

The implied agreement of common carriers is to carry safely,[25] and at common law they are held to a very strict accountability for the loss of, and failure to deliver, goods received by them for carriage,[26] being liable for all losses and injuries,[27] except as stated infra §§ 76–79, such as arise from an act of God or of the public enemy, the negligence of the shipper, or the inherent nature or vice of the property, or, as shown infra § 75, perhaps from some other causes which have found recognition in different jurisdictions. The rule might now be more fully stated as being that the common carrier is liable for all loss or injury not due to the act of God or the public enemy, the inherent nature or qualities of the goods, or the act or fault of the owner or shipper, it being understood that as to all of these excepted cases the carrier may be liable by reason of his own negligence or that of his agents, servants, or employees.[28] Where the loss is not due to the excepted causes, it is immaterial whether the carrier was negligent or not,[29] and the carrier cannot escape liability by proving reasonable care and diligence,[30] or by showing that there was no negligence;[31] and as to all of the excepted causes the carrier may, as shown infra § 80, be liable by reason of his own negligence or that of his agents, servants, or employees. In many cases the liability of the carrier has been said to be that of an insurer,[32] but in view of the exceptions to the rule of liability, the

The settled rule as to the common-law liability of a common carrier in connection with the carriage of live stock, where the same is in sole charge of the carrier and not accompanied by the shipper, or his agent, is that such carrier is charged with any loss occurring thereto which cannot be attributed to an act of God, the public enemy, or the inherent vices or propensities of the animals themselves.

Effect of federal legislation

While federal legislation on liability of carriers in interstate commerce supersedes state regulations and policies, it did not destroy but was intended to continue in force any right which shipper had under common law, not inconsistent with federal, and the common-law rule, making carrier liable for any loss or damage not the act of God or the public enemy, was not affected.—Bowles v. Quincy, O. & K. C. R. Co., Mo.App., 187 S.W. 131.

Avoidance of blame

(1) Where trees, which were damaged at defendant's depot by frost, were held by it as a common carrier, through failure to give consignee notice, defendant was required to acquit itself of blame as such common carrier.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Judd, 104 So. 418, 213 Ala. 242.

(2) Where goods were in good condition when received by carrier but in bad condition when delivered by it, the only defenses available to carrier at common law were that injury was caused by act of God, of public enemy, of shipper, or by inherent nature of the goods themselves.—Southern Pac. Co. v. Itule, Ariz., 74 P.2d 38.

Effect of Interstate Commerce Act

(1) At common law, express company, as common carrier of interstate shipment, is liable as insurer, and such liability is not changed by Interstate Commerce Act and amendments—American Trust Co v. American Railway Exp. Co, D C Ind., 42 F. 2d 272, reversed, C.C A., American Ry. Express Co. v. American Trust Co, 47 F 2d 16, certiorari denied American Trust Co. v American Ry. (2) The provision of § 20 of the Interstate Commerce Act, U.S Comp. St § 8604a, that nothing in the act shall deprive the shipper "of any remedy or right of action, which he has under existing law," means the common law as declared by the federal courts.—Sparr v Southern Pac. Co., 220 Ill App. 172

"A common carrier is a qualified insurer of goods intrusted to it for transportation"—St Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co v Bengal Lumber Co, 292 P 52, 145 Okl 124.

Effect of carrier's rule

Railroad company's rule, requiring owners to load and unload freight carried at carload ratings, did not relieve company from liability as insurer for damage to watermelons in transit, rule merely requiring shipper to assume burden or expense of loading and person ultimately receiving property that of unloading—Perkel v Pennsylvania R Co, 265 N Y S 597, 148 Misc. 284.

with only the exceptions recognized in the rule as above stated.[35]

It is undoubtedly well settled that at common law a common carrier is bound to deliver the goods that have been entrusted to him, or their value; and he can only justify or excuse a default where a loss occurred by an act of God, by public enemies, the conduct of the shipper, by the inherent nature of the goods, or unless special exemption has been agreed on by contract, the terms of which are not against public policy. This is not strictly speaking a common-law doctrine, for the law that makes a common carrier an insurer, and his engagement to the public a contract of indemnity, is founded on the Praetorian edict of the civil law found in the ninth title of the fourth book of the Pandects.[36] Under the Carmack Amendment, the common-law rule of liability attaches to a carrier, and it is not liable as an insurer.[37]

The general rule as to the carrier's liability is illustrated by cases holding the carrier liable for loss of goods by fire,[38] water,[39] theft or robbery,[40] or other accidental cause,[41] or by negligence or other torts,[42] such as negligence or wrong of the carrier or its agents;[43] and additional care taken by the shipper to guard its property does not in any

Constitutional provision as to grain

Under a constitutional provision requiring common carriers on railroads to weigh or measure grain at points where it is shipped and imposing on them responsibility for the delivery of such amount to the owner or consignee thereof at the place of destination, the carrier is not an insurer, but must deliver the full weight of grain unless prevented by act of God, public enemy, or shipper's negligence.—Shellabarger Elevator Co. v. Improper address

Notwithstanding it may be duty of shipper to address package, express agent in addressing it is not shipper's agent, but agent of company, and it would seem that company should be liable for loss resulting from any negligence of such agent in addressing the package.—Wall v. American Ry. Express Co., 272 S.W. 76, 220 Mo.App. 989.

Loss by fire

(1) Carrier, issuing bills of lading on goods received by compress company with which it had contract for preparing cotton for shipment providing that compress company should reimburse carrier for storing and handling, is liable for loss by fire caused by negligence of compress company, which under the contract became the agent of the carrier.—Chas. W. Sheppard Cotton Co. v. New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co., 78 So. 193, 118 Miss. 464.

(2) So, if the servants of both a railway company and a warehouse company, acting within the scope of their authority, entered a freight car for the purpose of preparing automobiles for shipment by draining gasoline therefrom, and undertook to do so with a lighted lantern, negligently brought by them into the car, in close proximity, both companies would be liable for the resulting loss of the automobiles by fire, whether or not the warehouse company had partially or entirely relinquished them to the custody of the railway company, each being liable for the negligence of its own servants.—Train v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 253 S.W. 497, 214 Mo.App. 354

Negligently inviting shipment

The carrier is liable for loss resulting from negligence in inviting a shipment when it had no facilities to move it promptly.—Missouri & N. A. Ry. Co. v. Potts, 10 S.W.2d 515, 178 Ark. 334.

Unauthorized reconditioning

Carrier unauthorizedly permitting shipment of cotton to be sent to pickery and reconditioned before delivery is liable for injury shipper sustained by reason of loss in weight of cotton in reconditioning process.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Weaver, 47 P.2d 104, 173 Okl. 156.

Free carriage

Where a carrier engaged to carry goods free for its contractor to do repair work to the place where the work was to be done, it was liable for ordinary negligence resulting in injury to the goods, the carriage being for the benefit both of the carrier and the contractor.—Bush v. Beason, 198 S.W. 130, 130 Ark. 569

Railroad as express company's agent

A railroad is the agent of an express company when carrying goods for it, and the express company must respond for the negligence of the railroad in transporting a shipment.—Vernon v. American Ry. Express Co., Mo.App., 222 S.W. 913.

Contract with government

Where defendant, pursuant to a contract with the government, transported merchandise, invoiced to plaintiff and requiring government appraisal, from the pier to the appraisal stores, defendant was liable for the truck driver's negligence under the doctrine of respondeat superior, as defendant was not a pub-

way lessen the burden of care incumbent on the carrier.[44] A carrier should not be required, however, to take precautions to protect goods, which the owner himself deemed unnecessary or undesirable to take.[45] Moreover, an express company is not liable for the conversion by its driver of goods received by him for transportation without directions from it, unless he had real or apparent authority to receive them and contract for their delivery.[46] Where the entire shipment reaches its destination in good condition, the carrier is not negligent, even though the shipper who loaded it misrepresented its contents to the carrier and consignee.[47] Where a carrier of live stock unloaded the stock en route for rest and feed, as required by law, and for that purpose placed them in stockyard pens, the fact that the injured condition of the stock was not discovered until after they were placed in the pens did not render inapplicable the rule that a carrier is an insurer of live stock, except against injury or loss from the act of God, or the public enemy, or from the inherent nature, propensities, or viciousness of the animals themselves.[48]

The carrier cannot escape liability for its own negligence even though the contract of shipment is illegal,[49] but where the action is based wholly on an illegal contract there can be no recovery thereon for the loss or conversion of goods actually received under the contract and actually shipped but lost in shipment or converted, although it has been intimated that, if the contract, while illegal, was not immoral, liability may be established independent of the contract, as by action maintained, not on the illegal contract, but on an implied contract to return the goods or make compensation for property which it has no right to retain.[50] The consignee is not liable for possible negligence or illegal operation of a company transporting the consignee's goods to defendant carrier's terminal as an independent contractor.[51]

Effect of invalid discriminatory contract on shipper's right to recover for loss or injury see infra § 394. Liability of initial carrier for loss on connecting lines see infra § 403. Liability of intermediate and terminal carriers see infra §§ 418–427. Limitation of common-law liability generally see infra §§ 88–117.

Reasons for rule. The strict accountability to which carriers are held at common law for loss or injury to goods received by them for carriage is not founded on contract, but is imposed by law for the protection of the shipper, and exists independently of any special contract, having its foundation in the policy of the law arising out of the hardship which would result to shippers from the adoption of any other rule.[52] The common-law rule is based on a number of considerations which have been enumerated as follows: The public character of the carrier's duties; the inequality in the footing of the carrier and the shipper; the absolute possession and control of the property by the carrier while in course of shipment, and the entire separation of the shipper from his property while in course of transportation and his lack of opportunity to protect it by any efforts of his own; the opportunity of the carrier for embezzlement and for fraudulent collusion with others; and the ordinarily exclusive possession by the carrier of the means of evidence, and the difficulty, if not impossibility, of proving the fraud or negligence by which the goods were lost.[53] In any case, the

"The common-law rule, making the carrier an insurer of goods in its hands for transportation, arose from the practical impossibility of shippers proving how the goods were lost. Frauds and collusions were easily practiced but hard to prove. The shipper parted entirely with his possession and control, and the carrier could pretend a robbery or accident, which had not happened"—

whole responsibility and liability of a carrier as an insurer of goods is built on the foundation of a delivery of the goods to the carrier and an express or implied acceptance of them on his part; and the whole theory of liability is based on the custody or right of custody of the goods by the carrier.[54] It has been said that the rule works no real hardship on the carrier, that the price of transportation will include a reasonable premium for this kind of insurance, that the rule being uniform and well understood, the rate of compensation regulates itself, and that the loss, if no fault can be charged anywhere, will be cast, on principles of true public policy, on the party whose diligence and care will be encouraged and stimulated by the risk.[55]

Louisiana doctrine. Under the express provision of the Louisiana civil code, carriers are liable for loss or damage of the things intrusted to their care, unless they can prove that such loss or damage has been occasioned by "accidental and uncontrollable events,"[56] by which, as shown infra § 76, is meant fortuitous events such as those which happen by an irresistible cause or which are caused by superior force which human prudence can neither foresee nor prevent Accordingly, the carrier is liable for a loss to which its negligence or that of its servants or agents contributed,[57] and, since carriers are bound to some vigilance, if a little vigilance and forethought might have prevented the loss the carrier is liable for the amount of the loss.[58] In a few cases, it is said that, under the law of this state, the liability of the carrier is the same as at common law,[59] but decision under an earlier code, which differed in some respects from the present provision, held that a common carrier is not to be held to the same strict liability as under the common law;[60] and under the present code provision, it is held that, while at common law the carrier is considered as in the nature of an insurer for loss by fire, unless it is caused by lightning, the civil law does not go to this extent; but,

"It would be interesting to trace the development of the common-law liability of a common carrier as insurer, but time and space do not permit this indulgence. It seems certain that the strict liability did not exist in the very early days of the common law, but the ordinary liability of a bailee then prevailed, but when England had become a great commercial nation then the law quickly adapted itself to the changing circumstances. The first liability growing out of a maritime venture seems to have been fixed about 1670 in Mors v Slew, Sr Thos Raymond 220 The reasons for the strict liability of a common carrier were set forth by Chief Justice Holt in Coggs v Bernard, 2 Ld. Raymond 909, as founded on the possibility that 'carriers might have an opportunity of undoing all persons that had any dealings with them by combining with thieves, &c. and yet doing it in such a clandestine manner as would not be possible to be discovered. And this is the reason the law is founded upon in that point.' The reasons for the rule suggested by Chief Justice Holt no longer exist in their primitive force and seem to have no application in cases of injury or damage to goods as contrasted with actual loss On the other hand, the tremendous increase in trade and the immense value of goods entrusted to common carriers make more necessary now the preservation of the rule itself. The comments and reasons for the rule suggested by Chief Justice Best in Riley v. Horne, 5 Bing 217 are those now generally adopted as more consonant with modern conditions 'If [goods] should be lost or injured by the grossest negligence of the carrier or his servants, or stolen by them, or by thieves in collusion with them, the owner would be unable to prove either of these causes of loss His witnesses must be the carrier's servants, and they knowing that they could not be contradicted would excuse their masters and themselves. To give due security to property the law has added to that responsibility of a carrier, which immediately arises out of his contract to carry for a reward, namely, that of taking all reasonable care of it, the responsibility of an insurer' "—Mercer v. Christiana Ferry Co, 155 A 596, 597, 4 W W.Harr, Del Super, 490.

Reason is "well stated" in Corpus Juris, which states, the reason for the rule substantially as it appears in the text herein, according to the court quoting Corpus Juris in Louisville & N. R Co v. Taylor, 205 S W. 934, 181 Ky. 794.

Dependent on contract

"In every case of an action for damages for breach of contract or breach of duty by a common carrier of freight to carry it safely, whether in assumpsit on the contract, or in tort for breach of duty, the right of action is dependent upon the existence of a contract of carriage between the plaintiff and defendant at the time the alleged cause of action arose (10 C J. § 130, p. 110); which contract, however, need not have been an express contract, but may have arisen from the duty imposed at common law or by statute, state or federal, in which case the contract will be implied in law from the duty imposed by the common law or by statute "—Chesapeake & O. Ry Co. of Indiana v. National Bank of Commerce of Norfolk, 95 S E. 454, 459, 122 Va 471, certiorari denied 38 S Ct. 582, 247 U. S. 519 62 L Ed 1246.

on the other hand, it does require the carrier to prove the precise cause of the fire, that it was impossible for human prudence to foresee or to prevent the loss, and that no act of imprudence or negligence is chargeable to the carrier.[61]

Negligence outside contract of carriage. An interstate carrier's tariff provision that corn might be shelled in transit merely permitted the shipper to have the corn shelled en route, but did not obligate the carrier to do the shelling, and a notation that it was to be shelled in transit was no more than a direction how the shipment was to be handled, and not a contract that the carrier would shell it, so that it was not liable for alleged negligence in shelling the corn, the charge for which was added to the scheduled freight charge and deducted from proceeds to the shipper.[62]

§ 72. What Law Governs

Actions for damages to an intrastate shipment are governed by the law of the state in which the shipment was made; but in the case of an interstate shipment the law of the place where the injury occurred governs in the absence of a contrary agreement.

An action against a common carrier for damage of goods shipped, where the shipping contract was executed and fully performed wholly in a particular state, is governed and controlled by the laws and decisions of that state,[63] but in an action for the conversion of goods shipped from one state to another, the law of the place where the tort was committed must control unless the contract otherwise provides.[64] The degree of a carrier's liability for loss or damage to an intrastate shipment is determined by what it would be at common law, in the absence of a contract with reference thereto.[65]

§ 73. To What Classes of Carriers Rule Applicable

The general rule of liability applies to common carriers of all kinds.

The general rule of liability heretofore stated is applicable to common carriers of all kinds and is not confined to any particular class of common carriers,[66] and, accordingly, it has been applied, among others, to a public truckman,[67] expressman,[68] furniture mover,[69] transfer company,[70] and a carrier of cars.[71] If a railroad company hires or charters cars to anyone absolutely, it has been held that the hirer cannot look to the company for damages in case of injury to his property; his remedy for injuries must be on the contract of hire, and on the implied undertaking of the company that the hired cars are substantial and will be duly carried to their point of destination.[72] Where one railroad company actually controls another and operates both as a single system, the dominant company will be liable for injuries due to the negligence of the subsidiary company.[73] Liability of lessor railroad for the negligence of its lessee causing loss in transit of goods and live stock see C.J.S. title Railroads § 355, also 51 C.J. p 1093 notes 68, 69.

The general rule of common-law liability as a common carrier cannot, however, be applied to one who is not in fact a common carrier.[74]

Shipment over dominant and subsidiary lines
Where cattle in shipment from New Mexico to Oklahoma City, via Texas, were injured partly in New Mexico, partly in Texas, and partly in Oklahoma, it was held that dominant carrier, over whose lines shipment was started in New Mexico, was liable for negligence causing injury to shipment in Texas, where it was shown that carrier over whose lines cattle were transported in Texas was subsidiary of dominant carrier, and controlled and operated by it as part of single system.—Davis v Alexander, 46 S.Ct. 34, 269 U.S. 114, 70 L.Ed 186, affirming 220 P. 358, 93 Okl 159.

§ 74. Private Carriers

A private carrier is not an insurer but is liable only for negligence.

A private carrier is not an insurer of the safety of the goods intrusted to him for transportation.[75] Where such a carrier makes a special contract for the carriage of goods or one is implied, its liability is governed by the terms of the contract if specially made or, if implied, by the nature of its implication.[76] As a general rule, a private carrier is under the duty of exercising at least ordinary care and diligence to prevent damage to the goods intrusted to him for transportation,[77] and is liable where injury results from his negligence or failure to use that care;[78] but his liability is limited to damage or injury resulting from such causes.[79]

The measure of a private carrier's duty may be affected by the matter of a reward for the service; if it is done without compensation and for the sole benefit of the shipper, the liability is only for gross negligence or bad faith or willful loss; but if it is done for a reward or compensation, the duty is that of ordinary care and diligence; the care required is such as would be suggested by the apparent nature of the shipment, if its true value is not known by the carrier;[80] and if the goods come into the carrier's possession in a way that does not show an attempt to evade the tariff requirements, and the carrier receives them for transportation for a reward, although ignorant of their nature, the carrier must exercise the care of a bailee to prevent their loss or destruction.[81]

§ 75. Excepted Causes Exempting Carrier from Liability

The rule of absolute liability of a common carrier at common law for loss or injury to goods carried is subject to certain exceptions.

The absolute liability of a common carrier for loss or injury to goods received for carriage is subject to certain exceptions. Thus, as shown infra §§ 76–79, in the absence of negligence on the part of the carrier, it is not liable where the damage was caused by the act of God or the public enemy, acts or negligence of the shipper, or where it resulted from the inherent nature or qualities of the goods. As shown infra § 113 a, the carrier is not liable if the injury results from some cause against which it has lawfully contracted. In addition to these common ones, further exceptions to the common-law rule have found recognition in some jurisdictions which exempt the carrier from liability where the loss or injury was occasioned

Furniture mover, if private carrier, is liable for damage only if due to driver's negligence.—Houle v. Lewonis, 140 N.E. 427, 245 Mass. 254.

Highway robbery
"The evidence clearly shows that the defendants were in the process of transporting the plaintiff's goods in the defendants' truck, when a car containing four armed men forced the defendant De Long and his relief driver to get out of the truck and turn it over to them and took from the person of defendant De Long $50 in money. Two armed men had gotten upon the running boards and forced the occupants to leave the truck and kneel with their faces down upon the rear seat cushion of a sedan, later forced one to go into an adjoining cornfield under armed guard while the other was forced to change a punctured tire, and subsequently, at the northwestern outskirts of Chicago, they were forced to leave the car. They thereupon walked to a farmhouse where they telephoned to the sheriff and the owner about the robbery, and the empty abandoned truck was found and recovered three days later. Can it be said under this uncontradicted state of facts that the defendant and his driver failed to exercise due care for the safety of the cargo in question? The trial court held to the contrary, in which holding on the facts this court concurs"—Beatrice Creamery Co. v. Fisher, 10 N.E.2d 220, 224, 291 Ill.App. 495.

Gross negligence
Where a railroad is acting as a gratuitous bailee, as where it is transporting household goods of an employee free of charge, it is liable for damage thereto only in case of gross negligence.—Tennessee A. & G. Ry. Co. v. Hunt, 13 Tenn.App. 590.

by extraordinary occurrences not within its control,[82] acts of the consignee[83] or owner,[84] authority of law,[85] or by acts of the public authority[86] or military forces of the government.[87] The mere declaration of martial law in a district will not, however, relieve a common carrier operating therein of all liability to the shipper, and where a shipment of live stock was appropriated by the military authorities at the request of the carrier, the latter cannot escape liability on the ground that there was a confiscation.[88] That seizure of goods under legal process generally excuses nondelivery is shown infra § 187.

The federal statute, U.S.Comp.St. § 8604a, making interstate carriers liable for loss, damage, or injury to property, it has been held applied only to property lawfully received for transportation, and not to property received for transportation in violation of § 8569 par 7, forbidding the transportation of property unless the rates, fares, and charges have been filed and published.[89]

§ 76. Act of God

A carrier is not liable for loss or injury to goods caused by an act of God.

An act of God is a justification for failure to perform a contract of carriage and relieves a common carrier of the liability for the loss of, or injury to, the goods concerned,[90] and acceptance and retention of freight charges by the carrier does

Part owner's breach of faith

Where bill of lading designating plaintiff as consignor and consignee contained notation to stop at point en route to complete loading by plaintiff's associate, and car was delivered to person intended by plaintiff for loading, railroad company was not liable for loss of plaintiff's property taken by the associate. "The damages suffered by the plaintiff in this case are the result of a breach of good faith on the part of its associate in the transaction. The carrier is not liable for damages or loss from a car while the car is stopped in transit, and in the possession of a part owner, and being loaded by the part owner of the property, pursuant to an understanding with the other associate"—Chicago, R. not preclude it from setting up the release of liability for damage to the shipment through an act of God.[91] As shown infra §§ 80–83, however, the rule does not apply if the carrier has been guilty of negligence which brought the property in contact with the destructive force of the actus Dei or unnecessarily exposed it thereto.

There is some difficulty in framing a concise, comprehensive, and accurate definition of the term "act of God" as that term is used and understood when applied to occurrences causing damage for which the carrier is not liable.[92] As thus used, the term means the manifestation of a superhuman power which breaks the chain of causation in the realm of human activity.[93] It refers to a natural cause,[94] a direct and violent act of nature,[95] and excludes the idea of human agency.[96] Moreover, the act must be of such a character that its effect could not be prevented by the exercise of due diligence on the part of the carrier.[97] It need not, however, be unprecedented.[98]

The terms "inevitable accident" and "unavoidable accident" are sometimes used as synonymous with "act of God,"[99] but they lack the suggestion that the loss is due to other than human agency, and therefore their use is not satisfactory. Indeed, it has been said that "act of God" is distinguishable from "inevitable accident."[1]

Particular occurrences considered. A loss by fire, unless caused by lightning, does not come within the exception of the act of God and is chargeable against a common carrier,[2] even though the fire originated outside of the premises controlled by the carrier, and was not due to any act or fault of the carrier or his servants, but was of such nature that by no human skill or foresight on the part of the carrier or his servants could the loss have been avoided,[3] nor does the fact that an ordinary wind blew the fire on the goods make it such an act of God as will exempt the carrier,[4] although it has been suggested, by way of dictum, that if a storm should arise and drive the fire with resistless fury on the goods placed at a suitable distance from the origin of the fire, the carrier's liability might perhaps be avoided.[5] Where the fire was caused by lightning, however, and the carrier was not guilty of negligence after it was promptly discovered, the carrier is not liable; and this rule applies where the fire originated on adjoining premises of a third person in which were stored, to the carrier's knowledge, goods of a highly inflammable nature.[6]

Cotton

That carrier knew cotton was stored in compress adjoining tracks on which carload of plaintiff's lumber was placed, and was aware of other dangerous conditions, was held not to render it liable for damage to lumber by fire communicated from compress when struck by lightning.—Britton Lumber Co. v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 127 So. 824, 221 Ala. 134.

A flood of such extraordinary character that it could not have been foreseen or provided against is an act of God, and the carrier is not responsible for loss of goods in his possession resulting therefrom.[7]

Although protection from ordinary weather conditions is a common-law duty of a carrier,[8] a wind and rainstorm of such unusual extent and violence as to be out of the ordinary range of human experience is an "act of God" within the meaning of the principle which ordinarily relieves a common carrier of liability for loss or destruction of goods in such cases.[9] So, where the storm was of unprecedented and unforeseen violence, the carrier is not liable for damages due solely to a hurricane[10] or tornado.[11] Likewise, an electrical storm is an act of God,[12] and so is a snowstorm which blocks up a railway and prevents the moving of trains.[13]

Extraordinary hot weather at a particular time is an act of God exempting the carrier from liability for injury to freight caused thereby,[14] and an unprecedented fall in the temperature which the carrier could not reasonably be expected to foresee, whereby the goods were injured, is an act of God absolving the carrier, in the absence of negligence proximately causing the damage;[15] but freezing weather coming at a season or a time when such weather may be expected is not an act of God,[16] and it has been said that the freezing of fruit is usually, if not always, caused by man's negligence rather than by any act of God.[17] So, the natural tendency of fruit to deteriorate under unfavorable climatic conditions is not an act of God.[18] Where the loss is caused by the breaking of a rail, due to sudden intense cold, the carrier is not responsible, the loss being properly chargeable to an act of God.[19]

Other occurrences which have been held acts of God exempting the carrier from liability are earthquakes[20] and the presence of ice in the harbor where the goods were transshipped.[21] Loss or damage to property in course of transportation through explosion of war munitions, also in transit, is not, however, considered in a legal sense an "act of God,"[22] and neither is insanity of the engineer in charge of, and recklessly running, a train.[23] At common law destruction of goods in transit, by a mob or in consequence of a riot, was not considered a vis major, and, as a general rule, no exemption for recovery could be had therefor.[24]

Under the Louisiana doctrine, stated supra § 71, that the carrier is liable unless it can prove that the loss was occasioned by "accidental and uncontrolla-

§ 77. Act of the Public Enemy

A common carrier is not liable for loss caused by act of the public enemy.

Inasmuch as such act puts it out of its power to do that which it had agreed to do,[27] destruction or conversion by the public enemy is universally mentioned as within the exceptions to the carrier's liability.[28] The term "public enemy" includes the military forces of a nation at war with the domestic

Duty of government

"The government itself, is called upon to protect its subjects from loss from such a hazard; as private citizens have not the power to furnish the security and protection required."—Thomas v. Boston, etc.,

government,[29] but, as shown supra § 75, the question of the liability of a railroad company for loss of goods, due to seizure by the military power of the domestic government, depends on other principles. Bodies of men not organized and operating as a military force against the government do not come within the description of "public enemy";[30] and, in the absence of a valid contract exempting it from liability in such case, the common carrier is liable for a loss due to depredations or acts of violence of such bodies of men as mobs or rioters,[31] or strikers,[32] even though the carrier was not negligent.[33]

§ 78. Acts or Negligence of Shipper

a. In general
b. Concealment of nature or value
c. Improper packing
d. Misdirection

a. In General

A carrier is not liable for injuries resulting from the negligence or wrongful act of the shipper.

The carrier is not liable for loss of the goods due to the negligent or wrongful act of the shipper,[34] to the disregard of a known rule of the carrier

Inability to move goods
Where barge in which potatoes had been shipped to railroad's wharf sank after railroad had accepted potatoes for shipment, but before the potatoes had been removed from the barge, the fact that the railroad did not have facilities wherewith to unload the potatoes because of labor troubles or strikes on the wharf was no defense in shipper's action against railroad for loss of the potatoes.—American Fruit Growers v. which is reasonable and adopted for the mutual interests of the carrier and shipper,[35] or to a violation of the rules made by the interstate commerce commission.[36] The shipper's failure to mark a portion of the freight shipped as required by regulations does not, however, relieve the carrier from liability for loss of the portion properly marked.[37] As shown infra § 198, in an action for delay, the carrier cannot be held accountable for injury resulting from a delay due to the act or fault of the shipper.

In general, aside from considerations affecting connecting carriers which are discussed infra §§ 400–450, a carrier is responsible for the safe carriage of goods only when it has exclusive possession and control thereof.[38] Accordingly, if a shipper accompanies the consignment and undertakes to perform certain duties of the carrier, that fact becomes a material consideration in determining the liability of the carrier;[39] and the carrier is not liable for any injury or loss that may occur through the act of such shipper or through any agency that is under his exclusive control,[40] this rule having been frequently applied, as shown supra § 64, in case of shipment of animals where the shipper accompanies them, by arrangement with the carrier, for the purpose of giving them necessary care If the shipper accompanies his stock and assumes to give them personal care during transportation, he must perform his duty with reasonable diligence;[41] nor is the carrier liable for injuries to a shipment occasioned by improper interference of the owner with the carrier's management of the transportation.[42]

If the carrier follows the directions of the shipper or his agent as to method of transportation, and loss or injury results therefrom, the carrier will not be liable,[43] unless because of an unreasonable delay

Negligence not imputable to defendant

Consequences to car of fish from consignee's failure to provide sufficient ice are not imputable to carrier, nor can he recover where his own negligence is as much cause of loss as that of carrier.—Emery & Co v Boston & M. R. R, 120 N E. 106, 230 Mass. 463.

(3) In an action by a shipper of mules which ate off one another's tails and manes, the animals being confined for more than forty hours without food, etc, the failure of the shipper to place chemicals on the animals' manes and tails, there being no such universal practice as to make it a custom and the carrier not requiring such treatment.—Hines v. 36. Rule not violated

Since rule of the interstate commerce commission providing that burnt cotton, which is cotton that has been on fire, and which has not been subsequently repicked and rebaled, must not be offered for shipment until it has been reconditioned, or until not less than five days have elapsed since the last evidence of fire therein, does not forbid shipment of cotton which had been part of a larger mass that had been on fire after five days elapsed, merely because there was fire in other cotton about two hundred yards distant at the time of the shipment, as discussed in § 19, the carrier cannot escape liability for the loss of the cotton by fire during transit, on the ground that the shipper was negligent in loading the cotton while still containing fire—Southern Ry. Co v. Pettit, Tenn, 257 F. 663, 168 C.C.A. 613, certiorari denied 39 S.Ct. 290, 249 U S 607, 63 L Ed 799.

Unrefrigerated car

Where the shipper of grapes contracted for transportation in a dry car without ice, relying on ventilation to protect the fruit, he cannot make that choice and then insist in transportation it becomes the carrier's duty to disregard the instruction and to take such precautions for the preservation of the goods as are rendered necessary by such delay.[44] Negligence in loading or unloading see supra §§ 67–70.

One delivering an automobile to a warehouse company for shipment may sue the railway company, to which it delivers the car, for loss thereof by fire after being loaded on a freight car, although the warehouse company was his agent, instead of bailee, as between him and the railway company, and the bill of lading was in the warehouse company's name, the contract being for his benefit; but he cannot recover if the loss was caused by the negligence of such agent, unless the railway company also was negligent.[45]

b. Concealment of Nature or Value

Subject to some limitations and exceptions, the general rule is that concealment by the shipper of the nature or value of the goods shipped relieves the carrier from liability. Whether a fraud has been committed depends on the circumstances of the case. Silence as well as untruthful statements may constitute fraud.

Where the shipper either by his acts or his omissions fraudulently conceals the nature or the value of the goods shipped, the effect of such conduct is to relieve the carrier from its liability as insurer;[46] but the decisions are not in entire harmony in respect of the extent of the carrier's liability under the circumstances. Thus, it has either been held or said in a number of decisions in which the goods shipped were money, jewelry, or other valuables so concealed as to hide their value and mislead the carrier, that the latter is discharged absolutely from any liability for loss or injury to such property;[47] and this rule is particularly applicable if the loss is due to the carrier's omission of such precautions as were necessary to the safe transportation and delivery of the goods, superinduced by the shipper's fraudulent conduct.[48] It is immaterial, as respects the carrier's liability, whether the deception resulted from premeditation or from inadvertence on the part of the shipper;[49] the intention to impose on the carrier is not important—it is enough if such is the practical effect of the conduct of the shipper.[50] However, the shipper's conduct will not operate to bar a recovery for loss of the less valuable goods in which the jewelry or money or other valuables were concealed,[51] and the weight of authority holds in respect of fraudulent concealment as to goods other than money, jewels, and other valuables, that even though the shipper is guilty of misrepresentation, intentional or otherwise, he would, nevertheless, be entitled to recover the apparent value of the goods according to the representations made,[52] but nothing beyond this,[53] and this rule is not affected by a statute regulating interstate commerce, which statute prohibits a shipper from obtaining the transportation of property at less than the regular rates established and in force by fraudulent representations as to value, and making such fraud a misdemeanor and imposing a penalty therefor.[54] Failure to give notice that the contents of a package are perishable or easily broken relieves the carrier from liability for the consequences of such failure.[55]

On the other hand, it has been held that, notwithstanding the fraud of the shipper, the carrier, that carrier must assume the peril of loss to the fruit in transit in the way contracted for, if it develops on delivery that ventilation failed to keep them from decay, when refrigeration might have done so.—Cassone v. New York, N. H & H R. Co., 123 A. 280, 100 Conn. 262.

although discharged of liability as insurer, is liable as an ordinary bailee of the property for hire and as such charged with the duty to exercise ordinary care safely to keep and to deliver the property,[56] and that a misrepresentation by the shipper as to the contents of the shipment, in order to obtain lower rates, will not prevent a recovery from the carrier for loss thereof where such misrepresentation did not contribute to the loss by misleading the carrier as to the precautions required for safe transportation.[57] Moreover, a shipper's misrepresentation as to value will not work an estoppel to recover the full value of the property lost or destroyed where, at the time of the delivery of the property, it was known or must have been apparent to the carrier or its agent that the kind, grade, or value of the property was not as represented, for in such case the carrier is not deceived.[58] The carrier will be liable for the amount of injury sustained by animals in transportation, notwithstanding the fact that the owner misrepresented their value in order to obtain a cheaper freight rate, where it knew that the value of the animals was greater than that stated; and it is not material that the carrier did not know the exact value of the animals.[59] It has also been held that, where there is no indication to the shipper or to the local expressman that the character of the conveyance affected the rate, or that the shipper had any knowledge of the fact, the fact that less freight was charged because of the misdescription of the goods does not relieve the carrier from liability.[60] So, an innocent misdescription of the goods shipped resulting in a lower rate being charged does not relieve the carrier from liability for their loss, where the bill of lading provides that in case of misdescription the freight charges must be paid on the articles actually shipped.[61] Where the consignor misdescribed the character of the goods in order to get them carried at a lower rate, this does not defeat the consignee's right of action for loss of the goods, although the carrier is entitled to an allowance of the amount of freight evaded.[62]

In some cases the view is taken that failure to inform the carrier of the nature of the goods shipped is ground for avoiding liability for loss thereof only if such failure amounted to actual or constructive fraud.[63]

Where by express statutory provision fraudulent misrepresentation by the shipper or fraudulent concealment of the value of the goods releases the carrier absolutely from liability, the shipper in such case cannot recover even the small apparent value of the package,[64] but this rule does not apply where, in the absence of fraud on the shipper's part, a carrier, although ignorant of the contents of a package, accepted it for carriage, and unless there is a contract limiting liability, the carrier cannot escape liability for the full amount of the loss even though it could have refused to accept the goods for shipment.[65]

Larceny by agent of carrier. The theft, by the agent of the carrier, of valuable articles or money contained in a consignment which a carrier had accepted for transportation, renders the carrier liable for the loss, although the shipper failed to disclose the presence of such valuables[66] or was himself guilty of fraud in not notifying the carrier thereof.[67] Similarly, it has been held that, where money intrusted to a carrier for transportation, and stolen by its agent, is recovered by the carrier, it will be liable therefor, notwithstanding fraudulent acts on the part of the shipper by reason of which only ordinary care was used by the carrier in its transportation.[68]

Dangerous character of goods. The failure of a shipper of inflammable and explosive goods to notify the carrier of their nature relieves the carrier of liability for loss of the goods due to explosion and fire.[69] It has been held, however, that a shipper of a carload of emigrant movables, whose agent, riding in the car to look after the contents carried a revolver and a shotgun and placed some cartridges in the oven of one of the stoves, together with some loaded shells for the shotgun, did not thereby violate the law prohibiting the shipment of explosives and other dangerous articles, so as to defeat the shipper's recovery for a destruction of the goods by fire started by sparks from defendant's locomotive.[70] Where the bill of lading described a shipment as high explosives, and placards showing contents of cars to be explosives were affixed to cars, the railroad had notice, as a matter of law, of the explosive nature of the shipment, within a provision of the bill of lading requiring full disclosure of explosive qualities of goods shipped.[71]

Reasons for rule of nonliability. Reasons on which the rule of nonliability is based are that the carrier is, by the fraudulent act of the shipper, deprived of the compensation to which it is entitled, in proportion to the value of the article intrusted to its care and the consequent risk, while such act tends to lessen the vigilance which the carrier would otherwise exercise,[72] and that, by reason of the fraud of the shipper in misleading the carrier, the latter has not in fact accepted or undertaken to carry the goods delivered to it.[73]

Right and duty of carrier to ascertain facts. It is the right of the carrier to require good faith on the part of those persons who deliver goods to be carried, or enter into contracts with it;[74] and inasmuch as the freight may depend on the value of the article to be carried, the carrier ordinarily has a right to inquire as to its value.[75] Ordinarily, it is the duty of the carrier to make inquiry as to the general nature of the articles shipped and of their value before it consents to receive them;[76] and its failure so to do cannot defeat the shipper's right to recover the full value of the package if lost, in the absence of any showing of fraud or deceit on the part of the shipper.[77] The rule is subject to the reasonable qualification that, if the owner is guilty of any fraud or imposition, as by concealing the value or nature of the article, or if he deludes the carrier by his own carelessness in treating the parcel as a thing of no value, he cannot hold the carrier liable for the loss of the goods.[78] In the absence of more definite information, the carrier has the right to accept the shipper's marks as to the contents of a package offered for transportation and is not bound to inquire particularly about them in order to take advantage of a false classification,[79] and where a shipper expressly represents the contents of a package to be of a designated character, it is not the duty of the carrier to ask for a repetition of the statement, nor to disbelieve it and open the box and see for itself.[80] Under the first Cummins Amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act, providing that if the goods shipped are hidden from view and the carrier is not notified as to their character it could require the shipper specifically to state their value in writing, the rules stated were subject to the further qualification that a carrier informed of the character of such goods had no right to require a statement as to their value or to rely on a value stated as determining the amount of its liability.[81]

Duty of shipper. Good faith requires the shipper to make the facts known to the carrier if the contents of a package tendered for carriage are perishable or easily broken,[82] or inflammable and explosive,[83] and, under a statute requiring the shipper to give notice to the carrier of the nature of the shipment if it includes silk or other specified articles, in order to claim the value thereof in excess of the statutory amount, the word "silk" imports manufactured silk as well as raw silk.[84] On the other hand, the shipper is under no duty to inform the carrier of the value of his goods when no inquiry is made; he is bound only to refrain from using any artifice, designed or not, by which the carrier would be led to believe that such goods were worth less than their apparent value.[85] However, as shown infra § 102, when the shipper has voluntarily made a declaration of the value of his property, and the carrier acts on such declaration in fixing the rate of freight and the manner of transportation, he is bound by his statements and cannot then repudiate them, although he may not have known that his statement was calculated to affect the carrier's liability.

Acts of shipper's agent. If the agent of a shipper makes misrepresentations as to the contents of a package delivered to a carrier for shipment, the shipper is bound thereby to the same extent as if he himself had made the misrepresentations.[86] The ignorance of an agent as to the contents of a package delivered for shipment, and innocence of any intention to deceive the carrier, or to conceal the value of the goods, do not affect the liability of the carrier where the principal intended to deceive the carrier or to conceal the value of the goods.[87]

What constitutes fraud. Whether a fraud has been committed on the carrier depends on the circumstances of each case;[88] and in a number of decisions, in which the courts have not always been uniform in the conclusions reached, particular acts of the shipper have, under the circumstances presented, been held to constitute or not to constitute fraud.[89] In general, the shipper may become chargeable with fraud, through imposition and deception, as well when he is silent as when he speaks that which is untrue.[90] So, it is immaterial whether the fraud is practiced on the carrier by means of actual false representations, or by so packing the goods as to induce the carrier to think that the cases contain only what the packing would seem to indicate, when in reality they contain something more valuable, the effect on the carrier's liability in each case being the same.[91]

Condition of goods

A compress company issued to a shipper receipts showing that it held for shipment on shipper's order a stated number of bales of cotton in good condition or to be put in good condition at shipper's expense. On delivery of such clearance receipts to railroad receivers, they issued bills of lading for cotton received in good condition at a tariff rate which required them to pay for the compression. The cotton was afterward compressed and shipped, but, owing to failure of the compress company to properly condition it by drying before compression, it was damaged before terminal delivery. It was held that for conditioning the cotton the compress company was the shipper's agent, and that the railroad receivers had a right to rely on the statement in the clearance receipt that the cotton would be properly conditioned before shipment and were not liable for the damage resulting from its not being done.—S. c. Improper Packing

For injuries due to improper packing of the goods by the shipper, particularly where the defect is not apparent, the carrier is not ordinarily liable.

One of the exceptions to the carrier's common-law liability arises in cases where the injuries are due to the improper packing of the goods by the shipper.[92] Accordingly, if goods are improperly packed, and this fact is not apparent or known to the carrier, it is not liable for loss or injury resulting in the ordinary course of handling and transportation from such improper packing, if it is itself free from negligence,[93] although, if the carrier is guilty of negligence but for which the damage would not have occurred, it is liable even though the improper packing is not apparent.[94] Some decisions hold without qualification that the full duty of the carrier is simply to carry goods in the condition in which they are offered, and that, where goods tendered are insufficiently packed, the carrier is not liable for loss or injury due to such defect, even though the defect in the packing is apparent;[95] but in view of the fact that the carrier is entitled, as stated supra § 28, to reject defectively packed goods tendered for shipment, the rule supported by the weight of authority is that if it accepts for transportation goods which it knows are defectively packed, or which by the exercise of reasonable care it could have observed were defectively packed, it assumes to carry the goods as they are, and its common-law liability as carrier attaches, and it is subject to all the liabilities usually attaching to an ordinary shipment of the same character,[96] even though the goods were not packaged in accordance with the requirements of classifications filed with the interstate commerce commission.[97] It cannot be said, however, under this rule that the carrier must, at his peril, know that the goods are not in fact safely packed.[98] The shipper usually knows better than the carrier the manner in which the goods have been packed and the manner in which they should be packed, and even though the carrier may have knowledge of some defect in the packing, still if it is not apparent to the ordinary observation of the carrier or his servants that the goods cannot be safely carried in the condition in which they are presented, the carrier should not be held to take the chances of injury from improper packing.[99] The shipper is not required to cover the goods so as to make them safe against external injuries, such as rain, wind, or fire,[1] but where failure of the shipper to comply with a rule of the interstate commerce commission prescribing the method for packing goods of the character which were destroyed was the proximate cause of the loss, the carrier is not liable.[2]

The carrier is not liable for loss or injury resulting from misdirection by the shipper, although it is liable if, notwithstanding such misdirection, the loss was its own fault.

Where the carrier receives from the shipper goods which are lost because of an improper address as to their destination, clearly there can be no liability of the carrier to the shipper, for the shipper's negligence in misdirecting the goods, or giving to the carrier the wrong address, has brought about the loss by his own negligence.[3] Furthermore, the consequence of defective marking will be charged to the shipper, although the direction of the package may have been written out by the carrier's agent, where, in so doing, he acted under the direction of the shipper.[4] Nevertheless, as shown supra § 44, where shipping instructions are not clear, it is the carrier's duty, unless an emergency arises, to hold the goods and ask for instructions from the shipper; and, in order to exempt the carrier from liability, the loss must have resulted from the negligent misdirection of the shipper alone, unaided by a breach of duty on the part of the carrier or its agent; and if the carrier itself has been guilty of some negligent act or omission without which, notwithstanding the fault of the shipper, the loss would not have occurred, it will be liable.[5] So, a carrier is liable for loss of goods notwithstanding misdirection, where it was not misled by such misdirection,[6] where it undertook the duty of transportation, knowing that the goods were consigned to a point that had no existence in fact,[7] where, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, it could have ascertained the proper direction,[8] or where it actually knew the proper direction.[9] Although the point to which the goods were consigned had no actual existence, however, the carrier is not liable if the misdirection was not so obvious as to require the carrier to ask for further instructions, as where there was a station on defendant's line with a very similar name.[10] The fact that the shipper may have been negligent in marking the goods shipped is no defense to a suit against the carrier for its conversion of the goods.[11]

a. In General

A common carrier is not liable for injury to goods solely due to their inherent nature and qualities or to defects therein.

Where the destruction of, or the injury to, the goods is due to their inherent nature and qualities, or to defects therein, the carrier is not liable, if its own negligence did not occasion or contribute to the injury.[12] With respect to perishable goods which themselves contain the elements of destruction governing their loss or deterioration, the carrier is not an insurer, and is no more liable for destruction or injury resulting solely from the inherent infirmity in the goods than for loss entailed solely by an act of God or of the public enemy, or by the carelessness of the shipper.[13]

"It is the rule of the common law that a carrier is not liable for losses or injuries resulting from the inherent nature of the goods, which would not have been prevented by the exercise of ordinary care upon its part, or for loss or injury to goods caused by an inherent defect in the goods themselves, the existence of which was unknown both to the shipper and the carrier"—Fort v. Assimilated to act of God

"Where the shipment consists of perishable goods, and their loss is occasioned by an inherent vice, or by natural deterioration of the shipment, unmixed with negligence on the part of the carrier, the damage can be attributed to a cause which is in the nature of an act of God, and the carrier, upon such proof being made, is relieved from liability, provided it shows that its negligence did not contribute to the loss thus occasioned"—Southern Ry. Co. v Standard Growers' Exch., 130 S.E 373, 374, 34 Ga App. 534.

Under Carmack Amendment

"The only loss or damage the appellant [carrier] is liable for under the Carmack Amendment is the loss or damage caused by it, and shrinkage [of grain] would not come within that rule unless the proof should show the shrinkage was caused by it"—Shellabarger Elevator Co v. Illinois Cent R. Co, 212 Ill App. 1, 6.

Md.—Atlantic Fruit Co. v. Pennsylvania R Co, 130 A. 63, 149 Md 1—Pennsylvania R Co. v. Walker, 128 A. 45, 147 Md. 323.

It is not correct, however, to say, broadly, that a carrier is not an insurer of perishable goods; he is not an insurer if the damage is caused by the goods perishing, but he is an insurer in all other respects just as if it were not perishable, as, for instance, if it be injured in a wreck, or fire, or any other cause not the act of God or the public enemy.[14] As to goods delivered to the carrier in defective condition, it has been held that the condition of the goods which will excuse the carrier, is some internal and latent defect at the time of making contract of shipment, of which the carrier did not know, and from which loss or damage ensues in the ordinary course of handling and transportation,[15] where defects in the goods are perfectly apparent, if the carrier elects to carry them it cannot urge these defects as a defense, but the full common-law liability will attach,[16] and if the carrier receives goods which are in such condition as to be liable to become damaged while in transit, it is bound to handle them with reference to that condition, and is liable for failure to do so, nor is it relieved of the duty under the contract to deliver them at the point of destination named in the shipper's contract by the fact that they were further damaged.[17]

The measure of the carrier's duty is to exercise reasonable care and diligence to protect the goods from loss or injury while in its custody,[18] taking into consideration the character of the commodity, the condition of the weather, and the time necessary to complete the transportation,[19]

Damaged goods

Following shipper's direction

Fading and deterioration of furs

In an action for damage for delay in delivery of a shipment of fur coats, damage for the fading of the color and deterioration from lying unused were recoverable, notwithstanding the carrier's receipt exempted it from liability for damage caused by the "nature of the property or inherent vice therein"; such a clause referring only to a special or peculiar quality in the article, which would render it intrinsically perishable.—Bawer v. Perishable goods

(1) The duty of a carrier is to carry a shipment safely with due and it is generally said that the carrier is liable for only such deterioration as is attributable to its negligence.[20] Nevertheless, if it appears that the carrier's negligent conduct conduced to set the inherent infirmity of the goods in motion to the damage of the owner, it will suffice to fix the carrier with liability therefor; in other words, the exemption on account of the infirmity of the goods obtains only where the loss is solely attributable to such infirmity, for if the carrier's negligence commingles with the infirmity and contributes in part to the damage, liability is entailed therefor against the carrier for his negligent conduct.[21]

The civil liability of a carrier for loss or injury to property carried is not affected by provisions of the penal law or compliance of the carrier therewith;[22] and the rules and regulations of the interstate commerce commission as to explosives did not supersede the common-law liability of the carrier, and they are not the sole measure of the railroad company's responsibility,[23] although the existence of rules and regulations of such commission and of the American Railway Association may have some bearing on the question of negligence of the carrier with respect to a particular shipment.[24]

Custom in shipping and transporting crude oil providing for strapping tanks in field three per cent short to allow for shrinkage, made part of contract of carriage, does not permit deduction of three per cent from amount of oil received by carrier, irrespective of whether actual loss from such causes amounted to that much, but carrier will be required to account to shipper for all oil received, less only loss due to excepted causes without negligence, such deduction not exceeding three per cent of total.—Enid Oil & Pipe Line Co. v. Champlin, 240 P. 649, 113 Okl. 170.

Presence of prohibited article

Recovery can be had by a shipper for negligent damage to, or destruction of, a shipment of lawful merchandise, which without the knowledge of either the shipper or the carrier contains a prohibited article or articles, where it is found affirmatively that the presence of such articles did not cause such damage or loss. Thus, a carrier was held liable where it accepted a carload of rags for shipment, which was damaged or destroyed by fire while in its custody, the jury having found that such fire did not result from the presence of a rag or rags containing prohibited quantities of vegetable oil.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Lipshitz, Civ.App., 29 S.W.2d 905, error refused.

Explosives

Compliance by a carrier with the requirements of a criminal law providing against the carriage of explosives on passenger vehicles does not affect its civil liability for loss or injury to other property through an explosion.—John Lysaght, Limited, v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 254 F. 351, affirmed Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. John Lysaght, Limited, 271 F. 906, certiorari denied 41 S.Ct. 625, 256 U.S. 704, 65 L.Ed. 1180, and error dismissed 42 S.Ct. 53, 257 U.S. 613, 66 L.Ed. 397.

Grain

"Section 4491, G.S.1913, providing that 'every common carrier transporting grain shall give the shipper, on request, a receipt for the number of pounds of grain received from him, and shall deliver such quantity to the consignee . . . less loss from transportation, not to exceed sixty pounds to each car,' construed as it must be with section 4492, which provides for a penalty for failure to deliver the proper quantity of grain, is held to be a penal provision only, and it does not in any manner affect the civil liability of the carrier. 24. Lime

As bearing on negligence rule of American Railway Association and regulation of interstate commerce commission as to transportation of unslaked lime was held notice to carrier's agent that car of unslaked lime might be fired if entered by water, although accompanying slip stated contents merely as "lime."—Porter Screen Mfg. Co. v. Central Vermont Ry. Co., 102 A. 44, 92 Vt. 1.

Applying the general principles here stated it has been held that the carrier is not liable for loss or injury due solely to such causes as fermentation,[25] depreciation,[26] drying,[27] decay,[28] heating merely as a result of transportation,[29] spontaneous combustion,[30] effervescence,[31] putrefaction,[32] or corrosion or rusting resulting from the chemical union of parts of the goods shipped.[33] Irrespective of the exemption from liability for injuries attributable to acts of God, which is considered supra § 76, it may perhaps also be stated as a general proposition that the carrier is not liable for loss happening from the operation of natural causes without negligence or fault of the carrier.[34] This rule has been frequently applied where the shipment was susceptible to injury by freezing and was so injured or destroyed,[35] and it has been applied where the injury was due to warm weather,[36] although, as shown infra § 61, the carrier is liable for injuries resulting from its failure to keep the goods under refrigeration when it is its duty to do so. It has been doubted, however, that it is an inherent quality of fruit to freeze; freezing is usually, if not always, caused by man's negligence rather than by any inherent nature.[37] Loss or damage to property in the course of transportation through explosion of war munitions also in transit cannot be attributed to any vice in the former property which was injured by the vice of the explosives and not by its own.[38]

b. Live Stock

In the case of a shipment of live stock a carrier not guilty of negligence is not liable for loss or injury due to the peculiar nature and propensities of the animals.

A carrier is not an insurer of live stock delivered to it for transportation, for it does not absolutely warrant such freight against the consequences of its own vitality, and if there is loss or injury due to the peculiar nature and propensities of the ani-

Reason for rule

A carrier of animals by a mode of conveyance opposed to their habits and instincts, has no means of securing absolute safety. They may die of fright, or by refusing to eat, or they may, notwithstanding every precaution, destroy themselves in attempting to break away from the fastenings by which they are secured in the vehicle used to transport them, or they may kill each other. In such cases, supposing all proper care and foresight to have been exercised by the carrier, it would be unreasonable in a high degree to charge him with the loss —Robinson v Bush, 200 S W. 757, 199 Mo App 184—10 C.J. p 123 note 45

Concurrent negligence

(1) While it is true that defendant is not liable for injuries caused by the inherent vicious propensities of the animals, yet if the negligence of defendant and the inherent infirmity or natural evil propensities of the animals concurred in causing the injury, defendant is liable.

Tex.—St Louis, B. & M. Ry Co. v. Murray, Civ App., 40 S W 2d 949.

(2) That hogs might have become diseased by exposure during transit would not necessarily exonerate railroad, if negligence combined with exposure caused injury—Vaughn v St Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co, 15 S.W.2d 901, 223 Mo App 732.

(3) A carrier is not relieved from liability for loss to cattle shipped caused by negligence or unreasonable delay by the fact that their impoverished or bad condition may have contributed to their death or injury, but, if guilty of negligence or unreasonable delay which proximately resulted in injury, the carrier is liable, although the results may have been more disastrous than would have been the case had the cattle been in good condition—Galveston, H. & S A Ry. Co. v. Buck, Tex.Civ App, 230 S W. 891.

Liability only for negligence

A carrier of live stock is liable only for injuries caused by its negligence, not being legally responsible for injuries resulting from the natural vice or the nature and propensities of the animals carried—Gulf, C & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Helms Bros, Tex Civ.App, 210 S.W. 853

Natural consequence of shipment

(1) In absence of negligence, carrier is not liable for condition of live stock, which naturally results from shipment—St Louis, B & M Ry. Co v. Murray, Tex Civ App, 40 S W.2d 949—Mais v. Panhandle & S F. Ry. Co., Tex Civ App, 25 S W 2d 1001, error dismissed.

(2) So, a carrier is not liable for damages to cattle during shipment which necessarily resulted in course of transportation between point of shipment and point of destination from ordinary handling, such as ordinary switching and confinement in cars—Lancaster v. Daggett, Tex Civ App., 272 S W 310—Hines v Thornton, Tex Civ App, 251 S W. 523.

(3) If there was no unreasonable delay, no rough handling out of the ordinary, or if cattle were damaged owing to their nature or condition or other causes over which the carrier had no control, carrier, if it used ordinary care, would not be liable—Panhandle & S. F Ry. v. Morrison, Tex.Civ.App., 191 S.W. 138

from such causes, if he has provided suitable means of transportation and exercised that degree of care which the nature of the property requires, or has not otherwise contributed to the injury.[40] This rule prevails at common law and no special contract limiting the carrier's liability in respect to injuries resulting to animals from such causes is necessary.[41] Where, however, the cause of loss is unconnected with the characteristics under consideration, the ordinary relation between the shipper and the carrier is not affected by the fact that the property transported is live stock.[42]

Notwithstanding the general rule of nonliability, the carrier is bound to exercise that degree of care which the nature of the property requires.[43] It is the carrier's duty to take notice of the weaknesses, character, and propensities of domestic animals, and to make such provisions against loss or injury therefrom as may reasonably be done in furnishing the means of transportation and providing for the protection of the property during transit.[44] The fact that the shipper was present in the car and saw that the carrier failed to exercise the required degree of vigilance and care does not detract from the carrier's liability as long as the shipper's conduct did not amount to an estoppel[45]

Applications of rule. In applying the general rule above stated, it is held that the carrier is not liable for loss or injury to animals superinduced by fright or nervousness, where no negligence is attributable to the carrier.[46]

Likewise, the carrier, when not itself at fault, is not responsible for damages caused by an animal's own viciousness or bad temper, or by the viciousness or bad temper of other animals shipped with it;[47] and as long as the conduct of the animals

(4) Thus, the carrier is not liable for injury incidental to a long trip in cold weather—Jordan v Chicago, B & Q R Co, 226 S W. 1023, 206 Mo App. 56.

Dog gnawing out of crate

Express company accepting dog for interstate shipment was held not liable for loss resulting when dog escaped by gnawing out of crate—Grant v American Ry. Express Co, 139 A. 784, 126 Me 489.

Poor condition of cattle

The weak and impoverished condition of cattle tendered to a carrier for shipment constitutes an inherent vice or defect, so that, in the absence of negligence on its part, a carrier is not liable for any injury or damages resulting from such defect during the shipment—Hartford Fire Ins Co v Galveston, H & S. A. Ry Co, Tex Com App., 239 S W. 919, reversing Galveston, H & S A Ry. Co. v Hartford Fire Ins Co, Civ App, 220 S W 781—Leon v Hines, Tex Civ App, 223 S W. 239.

10 C.J. p 123 note 42.

At common law, shipment of live stock constituted an exception to rule that carrier was liable for damages to goods in transit unless damage was caused by act of God, of public enemy, of shipper, or by inherent nature of goods themselves, and in such case carrier needed only to show that it furnished proper means of transportation and exercised reasonable care which the nature of the shipment required.—Southern Pac. Death of stallion

For such swaying, jarring, and sudden stopping as are ordinary incidents of transportation of live stock, even if they might be sufficient to cause a guttie, carrier would not be liable for death of stallion, since it is only when violence which produces a guttie, whether it be swaying, jarring, sudden stopping, or other movement, constitutes negligence or failure to perform its duty, that carrier can be held liable for injury or loss caused thereby—Vander Beek v. is not caused by any neglect of the carrier, it is not material whether it was such as would ordinarily occur or not.[48] A shipper in transporting several animals takes the risk of injuries inflicted on one animal by the vicious or restless propensities of the others.[49]

The carrier is not an insurer against disease in live stock,[50] and loss or injury due to want of vitality or sickness of the animals is not chargeable to the carrier, unless he has in some way been at fault.[51]

A carrier of live stock is not liable for injuries caused by changing weather conditions.[52] In the absence of some negligence or misfeasance on the part of the carrier or its servants, the carrier is not liable for loss or injury to animals occasioned by excessive heat[53] or cold.[54] This is a risk assumed by the shipper.[55]

§ 80. Necessity That Excepted Cause Be Proximate Cause

The carrier is not exempt from liability unless the exceptional cause on which he relies as an excuse was the immediate, and proximate, or, as sometimes stated, sole cause of the loss.

Where the carrier relies on one of the exceptions to his common-law liability, it must appear, in order to excuse him, that the exceptional cause, such as an act of God, or the like, was the immediate or proximate, and not the remote, cause of the loss;[56] and it is further said in some cases that

Where the evidence showed that hogs, dying in transit, died from pneumonia, and there was nothing to show or raise an implication that the pneumonia was due to any culpability or default on the part of the carrier, rather than to the inherent weakness or physical infirmity of the animals, the carrier was not liable, whether the hogs had pneumonia when shipped or contracted it while in transit—Bragg v. Storm
Where freight placed on pier for delivery to connecting water carrier was engulfed by sudden rise of tide without warning, after once receding, as result of continuation of a storm, and no tide had ever before covered the pier and weather bureau had given no warning that storm would be more severe than other storms, inference was authorized that damage resulted from sudden and unprecedented storm and rising of tide constituting an act of God and that no negligence of railroad proximately contributed to the damage.—Whit-to excuse the carrier the act of God, or the like, must be the sole cause of the loss.[57] Thus, if plaintiff's loss proximately results from defendant's breach of contract, defendant is liable even though one of the excepted causes contributes to the loss,[58] and it is very generally declared that, if the negligence of the carrier concurs with the excepted cause in producing a loss or injury, the carrier is not exempted from liability by showing that the immediate cause was the act of God, or some other excepted cause. As otherwise expressed, the carrier is responsible where the loss is caused by an act of God or other excepted cause, if the carrier's negligence mingles with it as an active and coöperative cause.[59] The fact that the shipper or a caretaker representing him accompanied a

Failure of inspection

Where plaintiff bought car of corn to be shipped by seller over defendant railroad on a stipulated condition that carrier would stop car at stated point for inspection and sold the corn to a dealer on basis of such inspection and he sold it at destination on same basis, and because of failure of inspection plaintiff repaid the price received and corn reached destination deteriorated, although in good condition at place of inspection and where last buyer refused to receive it, and plaintiff sold the corn at a loss, the loss was the proximate result of carrier's breach of contract to stop the car for inspection, and the carrier is liable for the resulting loss.—Bruce Bros. Act of God

In absence of contributory negligence, a carrier is liable for the full amount of injury caused by failure to properly shelter and care for dipped cattle delayed in transit, although the concurring cause was an act of God.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. of Texas v. Culberson, Tex.Civ.App., 248 S.W. 111.

shipment does not relieve the carrier from liability for damage caused by its negligence,[60] and the furnishing of a caretaker to look after heat protection of the goods shipped does not relieve the carrier from liability for acts of negligence in the management of its train;[61] nor is the liability of the carrier defeated by the fact that the extent of the damage was not ascertained immediately on delivery of the goods to the consignee.[62]

The maxim, that "In law the immediate and not the remote cause of any event is regarded," applies in cases of negligence affecting a carrier's liability, however,[63] and it must be true, as a general proposition, that, although the carrier is in

Act of shipper or consignee

(1) Although shipper of cattle cannot recover from carrier for injuries which were the proximate result of weakness at time cattle were tendered for carriage, carrier, having received cattle, is bound to transport them with reasonable dispatch, and on breach of such duty is liable for injuries proximately resulting therefrom, although results were more disastrous than if cattle had been in good condition—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Sanderson, Tex Civ App., 218 S W. 540, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

(3) Possible negligence of consignee of explosives will not relieve carrier of liability, if loss would not have occurred, except for carrier's concurring fault—Lehigh Valley R Co v State of Russia, C C A N Y, 21 F 2d 396, certiorari denied 48 S Ct. 159, 275 U S 571, 72 L Ed 432.

(4) Where fruit was damaged in shipment, although shipper was negligent in installation of heater or in caring for it, if negligence of railroad company in moving train proximately concurred with that of shipper as cause of overturning of heater and consequent damage to fruit railroad company was liable, notwithstanding fault of shipper—S. G Palmer Co. v. Illinois Cent. R Co, 204 N W. 566, 164 Minn 68.

(5) Where railroad by haste in moving freight prevented shipper from properly marking the freight, and where the railroad received such freight not properly marked, and issued a through bill of lading therefor, which did not show the markings on the freight as required by the regulations of the company, it could not avoid liability for loss, on the ground that the shipper did not mark the freight as required—Grammes v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey, 112 A. 532, 269 Pa. 466.

(6) Although there is a negligent misdirection by the shipper, the carrier is liable, as shown supra § 78 d, if the carrier itself has been guilty of some negligent act or omission without which the loss would not have occurred.

Inherent vice or defect

It has already been shown supra § 79 a, b that, if the carrier's negligence conduced to set the inherent infirmity of goods or live stock carried in motion to the owner's damage, the carrier is liable.

Negligent construction of bridge

Where shipment of sheep was delayed by wreck and washout of three bridges, the fact that the wreck and washout of one bridge were inevitable accidents does not relieve the carrier of liability where the wreck was cleared in time for the train to have crossed the bridge before washout had it not been for negligent construction of the other two bridges—Kansas City, M & O Ry. Co v. Blackstone & Slaughter, Tex Civ.App., 217 S.W. 208, rehearing overruled 218 S W. 552, error granted

Noncompliance with statute

Where the shipper failed to comply with a statutory requirement to give notice of the nature of the goods, if consisting of pictures contained in any package or trunk, he could recover nevertheless if the loss was due to the carrier's negligence—Wheeler v. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co, 26 N E 248, 125 N.Y. 155, 21 Am S R. 729.

Successive negligence

If carrier fails to protect perishable goods on consignee's failure to do so, negligence of consignee and carrier are not concurrent but successive—Porter v Pennsylvania R Co, 215 N Y.S. 727, 217 App Div. 49.

Failure to notify shipper

(1) While a carrier is exempt from liability if the act of God is the proximate and sole cause of loss, the carrier is liable if its negligence concurs in, and contributes to, the loss, as where the carrier negligently fails to notify the shipper that it could not perform its promise to make prompt delivery of potatoes shipped, so that the shipper could cooperate in the usual way by removing them to a safer place, and the potatoes were injured by freezing.—Merchants' & Miners' Transp Co. v. L J. Upton & Co, 103 S E 616, 127 Va 406.

(2) So, where a railroad negligently failed to give notice of arrival of cotton required by bill of lading, the fact that lightning caused its destruction was held not to relieve railroad from liability—Missouri & N. A. R. Co. v. United Farmers of America, 292 S.W. 990, 173 Ark. 577

Separable damages

(1) Shipper's contributory negligence is not complete defense in action for damages to live stock if damages caused by carrier's negligence and shipper's contributory negligence can be separated.—Fort Worth & Denver City Ry. Co. v Motley, Tex Civ.App., 87 S W 2d 551, error dismissed.

(2) Thus, alleged contributory negligence of shipper in shipping cattle immediately after dipping, and while they were in poor condition, is no bar to recovery of damages resulting from carrier's negligent handling of cattle, if the respective damages can be separated, but if not, it will bar recovery—Wichita Valley Ry. Co. v. Turbeville, Tex Civ.App., 269 S.W. 498.

(3) So, if part of the injury to a shipment of horses arose solely from the shipment being in a box car, and part solely from the condition of the shipping pens, the risk from the use of a box car being assumed by the shipper, while the improper condition of the pens was negligence of the railroad for which it was liable, the damage from each cause should be apportioned, and the shipper given recovery only for the part caused by the condition of the pens.—Gulf, C & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Culwell, Tex.Civ.App, 216 S W. 457.

some way negligent, if such negligence does not contribute to the loss which is due to an excepted cause, the carrier is not liable.[64] Accordingly, it has been held that the carrier is not liable if its negligence was the remote, and not the proximate, cause of the loss suffered, where the injury was the proximate result of one of the causes exempting the carrier from liability.[65]

Where the action is for breach of contract, the term "proximate cause," as used in the law of negligence has no application.[66]

§ 81. Negligent Delay in Transportation

The authorities are in conflict as to the liability of a carrier for goods lost as a result of an act of God or the like, where the carrier negligently delayed their transportation and thus exposed them to the hazard.

Apart from considerations involved in actions for negligent delay in transportation, which are discussed infra § 190 et seq, there is a diversity of opinion as to the liability of a common carrier for goods lost as a result of an act of God or other exceptional cause, where the carrier was guilty of a negligent delay in transportation.[67] Where property is destroyed by an act of God or other excepted cause, but would not have been within the range of the destructive force except for the negligent delay of the carrier, it is established as the rule accepted and enforced in the federal courts that the act of God or other cause, not the negligent delay of the carrier, is the proximate cause of the loss, and that the negligent delay of the carrier is too remote as a contributing cause to entail liability on him,[68] at least unless the carrier has such notice of the situation as to cause it to McCray, etc, Co, 190 N W. 756, 221 Mich 10, and cases cited. But, unless the carrier has been guilty of such causal negligence, it is not liable"—Standard Pickle Co. v. Pere Marquette Ry Co., 193 N.W. 300, 302, 222 Mich. 639.

Negligence of shipper

In an action by a shipper of stock for damages and shrinkage, due to defendant's failure to furnish adequate watering facilities, in that out of five pens wherein the cattle were unloaded only four were provided with such facilities, but wherein it appeared plaintiff, who was in charge of his stock, had ample opportunity to transfer them to vacant pens before reloading and to provide them with water, it was held that his failure to do so could be attributed only to his own neglect or misconduct, and that the negligence of the company was at most the remote, and not the proximate, cause of the loss, so that he could not recover, the proximate cause being that which, in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new independent cause, produces the injury, and without which it would not have occurred.—Kirby v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 197 P. 254, 59 Mont. 425.

Flood

(1) Carrier of goods is liable for their loss or damage only where its own negligence contributes as a proximate cause to their destruction by an act of God, such as an unprecedented flood.—International Paper Co. v. New York Cent. R. Co., 166 N.Y.S. 751, 100 Misc. 683.

(2) The proximate cause of loss of an interstate shipment through an unprecedented flood after arrival at destination was an act of God, within the contract relieving the carrier from liability therefor, although, had it not been negligent with respect to notice of arrival of the goods, they would have been removed—Hadba v. Baltimore & O. R Co., 170 N Y.S. 769, 183 App.Div. 555.

Causal connection

In action for damage to perishable goods in transit, there must be causal connection between carrier's negligence proved and damage claimed.—Lyon v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 136 S.E. 694, 103 W.Va. 73.

Shipper's disregard of agriculture regulations

In action against terminal carrier for damages for loss of sale of part of a carload of Christmas trees from moth-infested area, which defendant had prevented plaintiff from unloading pursuant to instruction of inspector of department of agriculture, it was held that plaintiff lost his trees through his disregard of regulations with reference to trees shipped from area quarantined.—Chapman v. 67. Citing Corpus Juris, it has been said in a case involving an interstate shipment: "Two conflicting rules have been established in different jurisdictions. (1) In several of the states it is held that the act of God completely exonerates the carrier even though there has been negligent delay in transportation, and these cases rest on the proposition that the delay is not the proximate cause of the loss; (2) In some other states it is held that the act of God does not exonerate the carrier where there has been negligent delay in transportation, and these cases rest on the proposition that the delay is a contributing cause, or a concurring cause, or a proximate cause, or a concurring proximate cause. . . . So far as we are advised, it has not been decided in Indiana . . . The rule first above stated has been followed consistently by the federal courts . . . apprehend the danger.[69] In other words, under the federal rule, unless the carrier is chargeable with some negligence other than delay in making the shipment, the destruction of the property by an act of God, not foreseen in time to guard against it, absolves the carrier from liability.[70] The federal rule is applied in some states in the case of intrastate shipments.[71] This doctrine is predicated on the view that, if the carrier could not reasonably have foreseen or anticipated that the goods would be overtaken by such a casualty as a natural and probable result of the delay, then the negligent delay was not the proximate cause of the loss and should be disregarded in determining the liability for such loss;[72] and it has been held not to apply where the carrier could reasonably have anticipated the loss as the probable result of its negligent delay.[73] Moreover, the principle is not to be so extended as to exempt the carrier from liability for destruction of goods by an act of God, where the carrier is guilty of a positive act of misfeasance in refusing to deliver the goods

Absence of negligence

In suit by shipper to recover damages for injury to interstate shipment of goods by an unexpected and unprecedented flood, where, due to large number of freight cars in train arriving at railroad's terminal, freight was not placed on pier for delivery to connecting water carrier until last boat calling on that date had left, railroad was held not negligent respecting delay in delivery of the shipment at the pier.—Whittier Mills Co. v. In Ohio

(1) There is a conflict of authority on the question The supreme court without deciding that defendant was a common carrier has ruled, where defendant contracted to tow plaintiff's barge from a point in Michigan to a point in New York but voluntarily delayed the voyage after it had been commenced, and on subsequent resumption the barge was lost in a storm, that defendant by the mere fact of the unnecessary and unreasonable delay did not become responsible for the loss, even though, but for the delay the barge would probably have been safely towed to its place of destination—Daniels v. Ballantine, 23 Ohio St. 532, 13 Am R. 264.

(2) On the theory that the cases were distinguishable in that defendant in the case at bar was a common carrier whereas in the Daniels case he was not, a contrary result was reached in a court of appeals case holding that if the carrier's negligence in furnishing a defective car, necessitating delay in reloading brings the goods in contact with the forces of nature (flood), the carrier is liable—Cincinnati, H & D. Ry. Co v Myers & Patty Co, 4 Ohio App 493.

(3) This distinction was denied by another court of appeals which expressly refused to follow the Myers case and, on the authority of the Daniels case, held a common carrier not liable for goods damaged in transit in a flood—Erie R Co. v. Kohler, 26 Ohio Cir.Ct.,N.S, 337.

(4) In a subsequent case applying the federal, and not the state, rule, the supreme court took cognizance of the attempt to distinguish the Daniels case and deny its application to common carriers and said, "It is difficult to perceive wherein the difference in principle obtains, since recovery must be based, not upon the degree of contractual duty cast upon the bailee, but upon the tortious act of the defendant"—Toledo & O. C. Ry. Co v. S J. Kibler & Bros Co, 119 N.E. 733, 734, 97 Ohio St 262, certiorari denied 39 S.Ct 10, 248 U. S 569, 63 L.Ed. 425.

(5) Where a flood which caused the loss could not reasonably have been anticipated, the carrier's delay, although concurrent in point of time, was held not the proximate cause of the loss, and hence the carrier was held not liable—Urbana Egg Case Co v. Nypano R Co, 16 Ohio N.P.,N.S, 321.

(6) Where there was such delay in transporting and unloading cars of wheat that the grade of the wheat was materially changed, it was held that the carrier was not excused from liability for the loss by the fact that the delay was caused by fear of the act of a public enemy, the shipment being a domestic one—Davis v. Early & Daniel Co, 16 Ohio App. 60.

Diseased cattle

Where a shipment of cattle, suffering from Texas fever, is negligently delayed by the carrier, and the cattle are damaged solely on account of their infection with disease, the shipper cannot recover—Ft Worth & D. to the owner on payment of the proper freight charges, immediately after which wrongful refusal the goods are destroyed by act of God,[74] and, as shown infra § 83, the carrier may be liable if damage ensues from its failure to exercise due care after discovery of the danger.

On the other hand, in some state courts the principle has been adopted that where the carrier has been guilty of negligent delay in transporting or delivering goods, and thereafter the goods are lost or injured by an act of God or other excepted cause, and but for such delay the goods would not have been exposed to the casualty, the carrier will be liable;[75] and this rule has been

(1) The rule applies, as stated supra § 80, that to relieve the carrier from liability the loss must be the proximate, immediate, or sole result of the exceptional cause, and if it results from, or is proximately caused by, concurring negligence on the part of the carrier, the latter is liable.

(2) Accordingly in an action against a common carrier, for breach of contract of affreightment, in not fulfilling its undertaking with plaintiff that it would securely keep and safely carry over its road, from Ottumwa, Iowa, to St. Louis, Missouri, and in reasonable time securely deliver to plaintiff's agent, in St. Louis, one hundred boxes of eggs, whereby such eggs were totally lost to plaintiff, it was held that the railroad was liable where the goods were injured by an exposure which would not have occurred had they been forwarded without delay, the delay which occasioned the damage being wholly unauthorized by the consignee or his agent, and occurring at the direction or suggestion of a third party who had no legal right whatever to control the goods. —Armentrout v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. Ry. Co., 1 Mo App. 158.

(3) The fact that damage results from the perishable nature of the goods does not prevent recovery if there be a negligent delay in transportation and this delay keeps the goods off the market until by its nature it decays—Ozark Fruit Growers' Ass'n v. St Louis-San Francisco R. Co, 46 S W.2d 895, 226 Mo.App. 222—Vernon v. American Ry. Express Co, Mo App, 222 S.W. 913.

(4) On the other hand, it has been said: "The elementary books as well as the opinions of the courts attempt to lay down a general rule upon this subject, which is substantially, that carriers are responsible for the natural or ordinary and proximate consequences of their acts, but not for such as are remote and extraordinary. . . . The general statement of the rule is easy enough, but the point of difficulty frequently is to ascertain whether a given case is within it or not. Here the act complained of is the failure to receive in its proper order of priority stock offered for shipment. If the bad faith of the defendant is made to appear, he is liable for whatever damages can be shown to have resulted to the plaintiff as the natural and proximate consequences of its act. The delay occasioned to the plaintiff, and the necessary expenses in feeding and taking care of the hogs, are therefore to be taken in such case as the natural and immediate consequences of the act. But this cannot be said in reference to the loss occasioned either by the death or shrinkage in weight of the hogs, unless it could be made to appear that these effects were in some manner caused directly by the act of the defendant. The witness, John Ballentine, stated repeatedly in the course of his examination that 'the freezing and piling caused the death of the hogs.' His testimony in this respect is corroborated by all the witnesses. But very few of the hogs died previous to the occurrence of the storm, and the loss of the plaintiff in this respect, as well as the large amount of shrinkage in the weight of the hogs taken to market, was certainly the natural and proximate consequence of the storm, and not the failure of the defendant."—Ballentine v. North Missouri R. Co., 40 Mo. 491, 505, 93 Am.D. 315.

(5) In an action to recover the value of goods received by defendant carrier at Sedalia to be transported and delivered to plaintiff at St. Louis, it appeared that the cars in which the goods were carried were detached from the train at Jefferson City and other cars were taken up in their place and carried safely through to St Louis. Plaintiff's goods were left in Jefferson City for one day and picked up by a train leaving that point on the following day. This whole train was burned en route at Miller's Landing by the public enemy, and plaintiff's goods were lost. There was nothing in the case to indicate that the goods carried safely in place of plaintiff's were entitled to any priority. The court held: "The evidence fails to show any unreasonable and unnecessary delay for which the defendant might have been held liable if any damage had been thus occasioned. But even if the delay were inexcusable, it was not the cause of the loss. There was no relation of cause and effect between that delay and the destruction of the goods by the public enemy. The loss was consequential on the delay in no other sense than that of being merely subsequent in time. The goods arrived safely on the next day at Miller's Landing No damage had been done by that delay. Then the act of the public enemy destroyed the property It was this act that occasioned the loss. As to the delay it was at most an injury without a damage, and as to the loss it was a damage without an injury on the part of the defendant. It is a well settled rule that the wrongdoer shall be held responsible only for the proximate and not for the remote consequences of his actions, and this maxim has been applied to cases of this kind—Denny v New York Central R. Co, 13 Gray, Mass., 481; Morrison v Davis, 20 Pa. 171."—Clark v. Pacific R Co., 39 Mo. 184, 190, 90 Am.D. 458.

(6) So, it has been held that delay of a carrier in transporting goods whereby they come in the path of a flood, and are destroyed by the act of God, is not a proximate cause of the injury.—Lightfoot v. St. Louis, etc, R. Co, 104 S W. 482, 126 Mo App. 532—Lamar Mfg. Co v. St. Louis, etc, R. Co, 93 S W. 851, 117 Mo. App. 453—Moffat Commn Co. v Union Pac R Co, 88 S W. 117, 113 Mo. App. 544—10 C.J. p 126 note 64 [a] (1), (3).

(7) Nor is the carrier liable in such case on the theory of breach of contract, as the consequence was not in the contemplation of the parties as a probable result of the breach.—Moffat Commn Co. v. Union Pac. R Co, supra.

(8) But the rule stated infra § 83 applies in this jurisdiction, and, as there stated, the carrier cannot relieve itself of liability for loss caused by flood if, by the reasonable exercise of diligence, it could have held to apply whether the goods are perishable or not.[76] The reason usually assigned for this view is that, where the goods are injured or destroyed by an act of God or other excepted cause while in the possession of a carrier, such default is an active and operative cause concurrent with the act of God or other excepted cause;[77] and it has further been said that the carrier should foresee, as any reasonable person could foresee, that negligent delay would extend the time during which the goods would be liable, in the hands of the carrier, to be overtaken by some such casualty and would, therefore, increase the peril if the goods should be lost to the shipper.[78]

Applying the principles above stated, it has been said that a delay in transportation will not be considered the proximate cause of the loss where the loss sustained was as likely to occur where the goods would have been if seasonably transported as where they were awaiting shipment,[79] or where the loss was the result of a contingency that could not reasonably be anticipated,[80] or of an act of God, so-called, relieving defendant from liability,[81] or where the loss occurring in transit was as likely to happen at one time as at another,[82] or where it cannot be said with certainty that the loss would not have occurred had the goods reached their destination on schedule.[83] As to goods destroyed by fire, however, the delay is the proximate cause of the loss where the freight was lying in a place known to be subject to a greater fire risk than in transit or at destination;[84] and where injury to live stock occurred by reason of its becoming restive as a result of the prolonged confinement and lack of exercise, the carrier is liable for any damages proximately caused by negligent delay in forwarding it.[85]

Where plaintiff brings his action under a statute requiring carriers to pay for goods lost or damaged or for any overcharge, he cannot recover for mere delay in transit and delivery unless such delay resulted in damage.[86]

§ 82. Loss Occurring during Deviation

As a general rule, an unnecessary and unexcused deviation renders the carrier liable for loss occurring during such deviation.

If a carrier in transporting goods unnecessarily deviates from the usual and ordinary route contemplated in the undertaking, he will be liable for any loss occurring during such deviation, although such loss is within the recognized exceptions to the carrier's liability.[87] Similarly, the carrier is liable where, having expressly contracted for a particular anticipated that such loss would occur or if it fails to exercise reasonable care to preserve the goods after the occurrence of the flood.

In West Virginia

(1) It has been held that where goods are injured by freezing weather, which injury would not have occurred except for negligent delay in transportation, the carrier is liable.—McGraw v. Baltimore, etc, R. Co., 18 W.Va. 361, 41 Am.R. 696.

(2) The rule that, if the proximate cause of the loss is an act of God, the carrier is relieved although preceding the loss he had been negligent and but for that negligence the goods would not have been exposed to the peril resulting in their destruction, has been recognized in this state, however.—Hutchinson v. 83. Damages from freezing

(1) Where potatoes shipped by rail reached destination three days late, but it could not be said with any certainty that if they had reached destination on schedule none of them would have been frozen, railroad was not liable to shippers for damages from freezing.—Barber v. Detroit, G H. & M Ry. Co, 164 N W. 377, 197 Mich. 643, Ann Cas.1918E 1109.

(2) So, where a delay in transit occurred after a shipment of pickles was subjected to destructive temperatures, which, had there been no delay, could not have been avoided, neither the delay, nor failure to notify shipper of connecting carrier's temporary embargo, nor routing shipment over such connecting carrier's line, was the proximate cause of the freezing.—Standard Pickle Co v. Pere Marquette Ry. Co., 193 N W. 300, 222 Mich. 639.

84. Forest fire

Where a shipper in Spring placed forest products ready for shipment at a spur in the northern woods on a carrier's line, and more than a month later such products were destroyed by a forest fire, the proximate cause of the loss was the unreasonable delay of the carrier in repairing its road, it knowing that such freight was subject to great fire risk.—Bell Lumber Co v. route, mode, or manner of transportation, or having received from the shipper express directions in regard to such matters, it transports goods otherwise than as stipulated or directed, and they are lost or damaged;[88] and, as shown infra § 116, such a deviation will deprive the carrier of the benefit of any contractual exemption from liability. Moreover, it has been said that, in departing from the established route, or from that fixed by contract, the carrier is guilty of misfeasance[89] and is liable for the value of the goods on the theory of conversion,[90] although there is authority denying liability on this theory.[91] The reason assigned for the foregoing rules is that the carrier, being in the wrong and it being impossible to determine certainly that the loss would have occurred had the usual course been followed, must answer for the consequences.[92]

The liability of the carrier applies whether such loss or injury was caused by an act of God or by any other agency;[93] and, furthermore, the liability of the carrier is not limited to loss and injury occurring on its own line, but applies equally to loss and injury on the line of a connecting carrier.[94] That connecting carriers are also liable for loss of, or injury to, property which they have diverted is shown infra § 422. It has been said, however, when a deviation from the usual or stipulated route or method of transportation is shown, the carrier may excuse itself by proof that subsequent loss or damage for which it would not, but for the deviation, have been liable, would have occurred had there been no deviation.[95] Furthermore, a deviation by the carrier from the designated route without the shipper's consent does not make the carrier liable for losses resulting from the shipper's inability to accomplish some special purpose of which the carrier had no knowledge.[96]

A carrier which never undertook to transport a shipment farther than a certain point, by changing the routing without notation on the bill of lading, does not become an insurer of its arrival in good condition at another, more distant place to which it was subsequently forwarded.[97]

Where the action is based on loss of weight of cattle due to alleged delay and other negligence of the carrier, no injury is shown by the failure of the carrier to send the cattle over the stipulated route when, as a result of the deviation they were delivered sooner than they otherwise would have been, although the distance traveled was greater.[98]

Wrongful detention

The detention of goods on return to destination, after having been wrongfully reshipped away, for nonpayment of charges, is wrongful, and subjects carrier to absolute liability for loss within detention period, the situation of the carrier being substantially the same, in such case, as if it had deviated from the route of shipment.—Belknap v. Animals

Where carrier of animals departs from stipulated route, it is liable for exposing their vitality to the conditions of the route, and is required to show that departure did not contribute to their death, Carmack Amendment not disturbing such common-law liability.—Ely v. Barrett, 168 N.Y.S. 419, 181 App.Div. 176, appeal dismissed 120 N.E. 60, 224 N.Y. 550

Corpse

Unnecessary deviation or departure by a carrier from a route contracted for in transportation of corpse makes the carrier absolutely liable for legal damages; and where a railroad company, at the time of sale of a corpse ticket and tickets to relatives of deceased, which called for transportation over a particular route, knew that the corpse was to be transported over the same route on the same train, failure of the tag on the casket to contain a direction for transportation over that route was held not to relieve the carrier from liability, where the erroneous tagging was done by fault of a baggage agent authorized to represent the carrier.—Lancaster v. 98. Tex.—Mars v Panhandle & S. F. Ry Co, Civ App., 25 S W.2d 1004, error dismissed.

While a carrier consenting to a diversion of a shipment is liable for a loss resulting from the negligence of its agent in giving erroneous directions concerning the consignee, if the shipper in such case knew, or should have known, that the shipment had been billed to the original consignee instead of the new one and was being held, after negligent diversion by the initial carrier, for tariff charges, and made no effort to redeem or forward it, the failure of the carrier correctly to designate the new consignee in the order of diversion was not the proximate cause of the loss of the shipment through sale to pay customs charges.[99]

The fact that a carrier which has wrongfully diverted a shipment failed to comply with the requirements of the Carmack Amendment in issuing a bill of lading does not affect its liability for loss occurring due to the deviation.[1]

Excuses for deviation. Consent of the owner will excuse a deviation,[2] and it may become necessary for the carrier, by reason of some emergency not contemplated at the time of shipment, to change the route or the method of transportation, and if so it will not be liable for subsequent loss or injury for which it is, in general, not responsible by law or by contract.[3] If it is practicable in such case, however, without risk to the goods, to notify the shipper, the carrier should do so and await further directions, rather than depart from the terms of the contract;[4] and this is so even though there is a stipulation in the contract of shipment that every carrier, in case of necessity, may forward the goods by any railroad between the place of shipment and the place of destination.[5] When the shipper is so notified, and he refuses to give further shipping instructions, the carrier may then return the shipment to him at his expense, and, thus being wholly without fault, it avoids all liability to him.[6] The burden of proving an excuse for a deviation is discussed infra § 254; and whether this is a question of law or fact is discussed infra § 258.

Waiver of strict performance. Notwithstanding a shipment of live stock has been misrouted, the owner may accept an imperfect performance of the contract and close contract relations, and the carrier cannot be held responsible for what subsequently happens to the shipment.[7]

§ 83. Negligence in Not Avoiding or Lessening Loss or Injury

Although loss or injury to goods results from act of God or other excepted cause, if the carrier is negligent in not avoiding or lessening the damages it is liable.

From principles stated in the foregoing sections of this Title, it is apparent that, if the carrier might, by reasonable care or foresight, have avoided loss by act of God or by other excepted cause, it will be liable. The duty also rests on it, as far as possible, to avoid or to lessen the damage resulting from such cause, and negligence in not so doing will render it liable.[8] However, under such circum-

Live stock
Under Rev.St. art. 707, providing that "the duties and liabilities of carriers . . . shall be the same as are prescribed by the common law," while there is excluded from the liability of the carrier all damages arising from the excepted causes—owners' negligence, act of God or the public enemy, and inherent vices and defects in the animals—the carrier is liable to the extent that damages from inherent vices and defects in the animals are aggravated by its failure to perform its duties, or to the extent such damages could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care, as live stock, by reason of their peculiar nature, if roughly handled or delayed in transportation, will suffer greater loss and injury as a result of their inherent vices than if handled properly and with dispatch.—Davis v. Sullivan & Opry, Tex.Com.App., 258 S.W. 157, affirming, Civ.App., 242 S.W. 764.—Panhandle & S.

stances the liability of the carrier is not that of an insurer, and it is ordinarily held bound to use only reasonable care to avoid loss or injury,[9] although it has been said that, when encountering vis major, a carrier must do all in his power to protect goods committed to his care.[10]

Application of rule. If the carrier, after becoming aware of a storm and impending danger to goods, could, by the exercise of such care as a man of ordinary prudence would have exercised under like circumstances, have protected the goods from the consequences of the disaster and failed to do so, the carrier is liable,[11] notwithstanding the storm itself was of unprecedented violence and could not have been foreseen at the time of the negligent delay, and when a delivery, by the exercise of due care, was possible.[12] Thus, although a storm may be such as to justify a delay in transportation of a shipment of live stock, if the carrier gives the animals no attention or care during the delay, and loss ensues, the carrier is liable for its negligence.[13] In order to charge a common carrier with goods lost in an unprecedented storm, however, plaintiff must show that by ordinary prudence it could have protected the goods after becoming aware of the impending danger;[14] and the refusal to perform special services not offered to shippers generally will ordinarily not support a charge of negligence.[15]

A carrier is ordinarily under no duty to guard against a flood far in excess of all previous floods until it becomes apparent that the flood probably would become dangerously excessive,[16] and is not negligent because it fails to guard against a rise of water not reasonably to be expected.[17] On the other hand, an unprecedented flood is not the proximate cause of loss, so as to relieve a carrier of liability therefor, if the carrier has notice of the danger in time to avert the loss by an exercise of the care and diligence which the circumstances and its relation to the owner demand, and negligently fails to do so.[18] It follows that the carrier cannot relieve itself from liability for loss or injury caused by an extraordinary or unprecedented flood, if, by the reasonable exercise of diligence, it could have anticipated that such loss or injury would occur, or if it fails to exercise reasonable care to preserve the goods from loss or injury after the occurrence of the flood.[19] Accordingly, the carrier is responsible for injuries to freight by a flood, where at the date the goods were delivered the officer in charge of the United States weather bureau notified all railroad companies of the coming flood and warned them to guard their property in the

Diligence of prudent, skillful men

In the case of accident or emergency, the carrier "is bound to such means as would suggest themselves to, and be within the knowledge and capacity of well-informed and competent business men in such positions, and such diligence as prudent, skillful men, engaged in that kind of business, might fairly be expected to use under like circumstances, and that this diligence and those means should be actively used to protect and secure the property confided to their care. Refusal not constituting negligence

The refusal of a carrier to put a carload of bananas, which had been provided with a heater by the railroad and a caretaker by the shipper, in a roundhouse during a severe snowstorm, or to attach the car to a passenger train to expedite the shipment, was held not a refusal to act in an emergency such as would justify recovery against the railroad for damage to the shipment.—Dolan Fruit Co. v. lowlands, and the carrier exposed the goods negligently to injury;[20] nor is inaccuracy in the weather bureau's forecast a defense, where the carrier showed no reasonable activity to protect the shipment after being warned of the impending flood.[21] The duty to exercise reasonable care to preserve the goods after the occurrence of the flood is a continuing one as long as the loss is avoidable.[22] If the carrier failed to act promptly on an alarm of impending apparent danger by a rising flood and failed to have the goods moved to a place of safety before the flood reached them, and the goods were consequently ruined, the carrier is liable for the loss,[23] and the fact that the storm which occasioned the flood was unprecedented will not relieve the carrier from liability in such case.[24] So, the carrier is liable where the transportation of certain goods was delayed by the unusually high waters, and it did not appear that the carrier, knowing that a delay would result in their loss, made any effort to send them by another route.[25] In view of the rule of nonliability for acts of God, stated supra § 76, however, the carrier is not liable if it did everything within reason to protect the goods after discovery of the danger, and was not negligent.[26]

A carrier is liable for loss or injury to goods caused by freezing where it should have foreseen that they might be exposed to cold sufficient to freeze them and failed to guard against the contingency.[27] So, after termination of the transportation, failure of the carrier properly to store the goods and to protect them against freezing weather renders it liable.[28]

While it is the duty of the carrier, as shown infra § 199, to advise the shipper of probable delay in transportation which is within the knowledge of the carrier and not within the knowledge of the shipper, and while, as there stated, if it fails in its duty in this respect, a delay in transportation will not be excused, where goods in transit were subject to freezing temperatures before a delay of uncertain duration, failure to notify the consignor and consignee of the delay and of low temperature at the place of delay is not negligence, since such notice, if given, would have availed nothing.[29]

Although goods shipped catch fire without the carrier's negligence, yet if the carrier's agents do not make all proper necessary efforts to save the goods, it is still responsible for all that might have been saved, and for any portion saved the carrier is liable, no matter what afterward becomes of it.[30]

Where the consignee agreed to take care of the goods while in transit, the carrier is not liable for their loss on the theory that the refusal of the carrier's gateman to permit the consignee to enter its yard for that purpose after the closing hour was negligence.[31]

If a carrier to which goods had been shipped accepted them before removal from a barge with knowledge of its leaky condition, it was liable for the loss of the goods when the barge sank at its wharf, notwithstanding the condition of the barge.[32]

§ 84. Commencement and Termination of Liability

As shown infra § 145, ordinarily the carrier becomes responsible as such immediately on delivery of the goods to it, unless the shipper has something further to do with them; and this liability continues, under the rule stated infra § 185, until it delivers the goods at the point of destination, when its liability as carrier ceases.

§ 85. Effect of Right of Carrier to Refuse to Receive Goods

A carrier is not liable as common carrier for goods destroyed on its premises after rightfully refusing to receive them, but although it could have refused to receive them, if it did receive them it is liable as common carrier.

Where the carrier has rightfully refused to receive goods offered for transportation, it is not liable as common carrier for their destruction by fire while on its loading platform.[33] On the other hand, although the carrier, under the rules stated supra § 28, had a reasonable ground for refusing to receive such goods, yet if it did receive them, it has been held that its common-law liability attached, and that it could exonerate itself from liability only by showing loss by the act of God or of the public enemy, or by the shipper's negligence.[34] This rule has been particularly applied where the road was in control of the military,[35] and, as shown supra §§ 67 b and 78 c respectively, where, without being required to do so, it accepts goods which are defectively loaded or packed, in which case it assumes to carry them as they are, although, as indicated in the sections last referred to, the view has been taken that the carrier is not liable for injuries resulting from the defect.

§ 86. Duties after Disaster

Although the carrier is not liable for injury to goods from excepted causes, it is its duty to use reasonable care to salvage the goods or permit the owner to do so.

It has already been shown, supra § 83, that although loss or injury to goods in transportation results from an act of God or other cause for which no liability attaches, the duty rests on the carrier to exercise reasonable care to avoid or lessen the damage resulting from such cause. Applying this general principle, it is held that, where goods are wet by an extraordinary flood, the carrier may still be held liable for damages resulting from not drying them or for refusal to deliver them to the consignee for drying when it had no facilities for doing so.[36] However, where the heating of a shipment of perishable goods was caused by their inherent character and not by any fault of the carrier or any extraneous agency operating on them while in shipment, the carrier was under no duty to cause them to be reconditioned.[37] In emergencies of this character the carrier, as a trustee for the shipper or owner, may act in a prudent way to salvage the goods, but it is the carrier's duty, before appropriating the goods for the purpose, first to notify the owner if at all practicable, and its failure to do so makes it liable.[38] Moreover, to relieve the carrier from responsibility, on notifying the shipper or owner it must fully disclose the facts.[39]

§ 87. Insurance by Carrier against Usual Risks as Affecting Liability

Insurance taken by the carrier does not lessen its responsibility.

The fact that the carrier gets the goods insured against the usual risk does not in any way lessen its responsibility to the shipper, but rather increases its means of meeting that responsibility.[40]

That the carrier is not entitled to the benefit of insurance taken by the shipper is shown infra § 398.

2. Limiting or Extending Common-Law Liability

§ 88. What Law Governs

Questions relating to contractual limitations of liability are governed by state law in the case of intrastate shipments, by federal law when an interstate shipment is involved, and by common law in the case of an international shipment.

Questions relating to contractual limitation of liability in an intrastate shipment of goods are governed by the law of the state in which the shipment is made.[41] Where such questions arise with respect to interstate shipments, the federal law controls.[42] A contract for the transportation of goods to a foreign country not adjacent is not controlled either by the federal or state statutes forbidding the limitation of liability by the carrier, but rather is controlled by the principles of the common law;[43] the provision of the Cummins amendment, imposing on a carrier liability for the full loss or damage to interstate shipments, or shipments "to an adjacent foreign country," notwithstanding any limitation in the bill of lading does not apply in such case.[44] As shown in the title Commerce § 92, also 12 C.J. p 86 note 44, the Carmack Amendment supersedes all policies and constitutional or statutory regulations of a particular state on the subject of limited liability contracts in so far as interstate shipments are concerned. It follows, therefore, that no question can now arise as to the conflict of state laws in respect of the validity of contracts for interstate shipments limiting the carrier's common-law liability, and all previous contrary decisions on the subject, whether state or federal, have been nullified. Where an interstate motor carrier's limitation of liability for shipment preceded the date to which the interstate commerce commission postponed the efficacy of the provisions of the Motor Carrier Act permitting limitation of liability only on the proper filing of alternative rates, the validity of the limitation of liability clause was determinable under the law of the state where the shipment originated and the action for the loss thereof was brought.[45]

§ 89. How Limitation of Liability Effected

Limitations of the carrier's liability must be effected by unambiguous and clearly understood contract with the shipper knowingly made at the time of the receipt of the goods for carriage, otherwise full common-law liability attaches.

A common carrier has no power to limit its common-law liability except with the assent of the shipper, and, accordingly, such a carrier cannot relieve itself from any part of its common-law liability for the loss or injury of property carried by it, except by express or implied contract with the shipper;[46] and there is authority holding that such a contract must be express,[47] but, unless a governing statute provides otherwise,[48] it may be either verbal or written.[49] In the absence of a valid contract limiting liability, the full liability as at common law attaches,[50] and it is immaterial in such case that the carrier quoted and collected a rate

"Where goods are received for shipment by a carrier and no receipt or bill of lading is at the time delivered to the shipper, but the goods are received for shipment without any express agreement between the carrier and the shipper, and the carrier voluntarily accepts the goods for shipment, it undertakes to trans-

applicable to shipment under a limited liability contract.[51] The fact that the interstate commerce commission has given the carrier the right to make a given contract does not authorize its enforcement until the contract is in fact made.[52]

The contract must be knowingly and understandingly made between the parties,[53] and must be unequivocal and unambiguous,[54] and not open to any reasonable doubt as to the intention of the parties.[55] Its language must be so clear that it cannot be misunderstood,[56] and nothing should be left to implication or inference,[57] particularly where the controlling statute provides that a party who accepts a contract of carriage with a knowledge of its terms assents to the limitation to the carrier's liability stated therein.[58] So, if the alleged special contract is in writing, it must be expressed in such manner and form as to be understood by a person of average intelligence, or if not so expressed it must be explained to the person to be bound, unless he himself has such knowledge of the subject as will enable him to understand the meaning of the writing.[59]

Furthermore, the limitation of liability must be made at the time of the receipt of the goods for shipment,[60] and, as shown infra § 91 c, a delivery afterward by a carrier to a shipper of a written receipt or bill of lading purporting to have been issued as of date of shipment and limiting the carrier's common-law liability, and retention of such receipt of bill by the shipper, will not, in absence of express agreement or an agreement implied from previous conduct, render the stipulations binding as a part of the contract, even though the receipt or bill of lading was delivered at the shipper's request.

Nor can interstate carriers relieve themselves from liability as carriers by a stipulation in an independent contract, such as the lease of an elevator, warehouse, or part of the right of way, having no connection with the contract of shipment of the goods.[61]

Limitations on a carrier's liability contained in its official classification approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission before the shipment was made, apply, however, to an interstate shipment, although the bill of lading was on a form formerly in use and did not contain the limitations of the current classification.[62]

signees, could not affect the rights of a consignee having no knowledge of the agreement.[63]

Right to limit liability as affected by statutory provisions see infra § 91, and generally the C.J.S. title Commerce § 91, also 12 C.J. p 86 note 41–p 89 note 84.

§ 90. Notice

In the absence of express assent by the shipper, mere notice of a limitation of the common-law liability will not relieve the carrier, although such assent may be conclusively presumed under the interstate commerce act where a regulation limiting liability is filed with the interstate commerce commission.

Contrary to the English doctrine, it has always been the rule in the United States that a common carrier cannot limit its common-law liability merely by giving a particular notice to the shipper, or by a general notice to the public, although such latter notice is brought to the knowledge of the shipper. In either case, according to the great weight of authority, there must be express assent on the part of the shipper to render the limitation binding.[64] Notwithstanding the notice, the owner, it is said, has a right to insist that the carrier shall receive and carry goods subject to all the incidents of his employment; and there can be no presumption, when they are delivered to, and received by, the carrier, that the owner intended to abandon any of his legal rights or to yield to the wishes of the carrier.[65] Within the rule under consideration, it is very generally held that limitations marked or indorsed on the back of a shipping receipt or a bill of lading, or even on its face, are nothing more than a mere notice and do not bind the shipper unless he knows of, and assents to, them,[66] but where the limitation is stamped on the face of the contract by the carrier's agent in the presence of the shipper, and before it is signed and delivered to him, he will be bound thereby.[67] On the other hand, it has been said that a distinction exists between the effect of those notices by a carrier which seeks to discharge itself from duties which the law has annexed to its employment and those designed simply to insure good faith and fair dealing on the part of its employer; in the latter case notice alone, if brought home to the knowledge of the owner of the property delivered for carriage, will be sufficient.[68] Furthermore, it has been held that where a shipper undertakes to prove a contract of shipment by the company's tariff rates as posted in the stations, which vary what would otherwise be the legal obligations of the company, he is bound by any provisions therein favorable to the carrier;[69] and, of course, a common carrier may limit its responsibility for freight by notice containing reasonable restrictions, if brought home to the owner of the goods and assented to, and if the terms for transportation were adopted as the contract between the parties.[70]

Filing of regulations with interstate commerce commission. Although there is authority to the contrary,[71] it is generally held that under the interstate commerce act and its amendments a regulation filed with the interstate commerce commission limiting the liability of the carrier to a specified amount, in the absence of the declaration of a greater value, is conclusively presumed to be a part of the contract of carriage and governs the liability of the carrier.[72] The shipper is bound to take notice of the rates filed, and actual want of knowledge is no excuse; and to the extent that such limitations of liability are not forbidden

by law they become, when filed, a part of the rate.[73] Where a carrier had no joint rates over its line and that of a connecting carrier, but the rates of each were duly published, the fact that no through rates were published did not relieve the shipper of notice of the connecting local rates based on valuation.[74] In so far as any of the provisions of a uniform live-stock contract contravenes the settled principles of common law preventing a carrier from contracting against liability for loss caused by its own negligence, however, it gains nothing from being filed with the interstate commerce commission.[75]

§ 91. Stipulations in Shipping Receipts or Bills of Lading

a. Shipping receipts in general
b. Bills of lading in general
c. Stipulations in bill of lading or receipt after delivery for shipment

a. Shipping Receipts in General

(1) Receipt made out by shipper
(2) Receipt not made out by shipper

(1) Receipt Made Out by Shipper

Where the shipping receipt is made out by the shipper he cannot claim ignorance of provisions therein limiting liability.

Where a shipper of goods who has been provided with blank receipts fills out one ready for the signature of the carrier's agent and presents it to him, and the receipt is signed by the agent and returned, this constitutes a special contract between the parties, including all the provisions therein contained limiting the carrier's liability, and the shipper cannot plead ignorance of its terms.[76] Under these circumstances, it is said, there is a proposal on the part of the shipper for a special contract wholly of his own creation,[77] and, as stated infra § 254, the shipper is presumed to know the contents of the instrument.

(2) Receipt Not Made Out by Shipper

Although there is authority to the contrary, the general rule, subject to statutory modification, is that the shipper is bound by a valid limitation of the carrier's liability embodied in a receipt delivered by the carrier to the shipper and accepted by the latter.

Where a stipulation for a valid limitation of the carrier's liability is embodied in a receipt, delivered by the carrier to the shipper and accepted by the latter, by the weight of authority the assent of the shipper to such stipulation is presumed as will be shown in § 254, and the limitation thus embodied will be binding upon him as a special contract in the absence of evidence of fraud, imposition, or deceit practiced by the carrier, and it is immaterial that such shipper did not sign the receipt;[78] the agreement may be direct

Acceptance of receipt

Where jeweler, returning diamonds to company which had submitted them for inspection filled in receipt of express company, excepting rate and agent's signature, agent inserting rate, signing receipt, delivering it, and receiving package, acceptance of receipt by jeweler made its provisions binding upon him.—Tribble v. Southern Express Co., 96 S.E. 712, 111 S.C. 31, certiorari denied 39 S.Ct. 287, 248 U.S. 582, 63 L.Ed. 432.

Inducing carrier to sign receipt

In an action for value of a trunk lost in transit, where plaintiff with full knowledge of his loss induced carrier's agent to sign his receipt, he could not, to avoid being bound by a provision limiting liability for loss, complain that the signature was missing when he accepted the receipt.—Wolfe v. In Georgia, although in cases arising under the state statute a different rule ordinarily applies as shown infra this section, the rule of the text has been followed as the federal rule in an action based on an interstate shipment.—American Ry. Express Co. v. S. & W. Estroff, 125 S.E. 40, 159 Ga. 58, affirming 121 S.E. 711, 31 Ga.App. 577—Lynch v. Southern Express Co., 90 S.E. 655, 18 Ga.App. 761, conforming to answers to certified questions 90 S.E. 527, 146 Ga. 68

In South Carolina the rule of the text, being the federal rule, is applied where interstate shipments are involved.—Huddy v. Railway Express Agency, 188 S.E. 247, 181 S.C. 508

Under federal legislation

(1) Under the Cummins amendment, permitting the carrier to limit its liability to a stated value, unless a greater value is declared in writing by the shipper or agreed on in writing as the released value of the property, it is not essential that an express receipt limiting the liability to the basic valuation in consideration of the reduced rate be signed by the shipper to be binding on him, although such signature would be additional evidence of his agreement, but his acceptance of the receipt, the contents of which he is presumed to know, is an assent to its terms, and express or it may arise indirectly out of the acceptance by the shipper of a receipt from the carrier in which the limitation is embodied.[79] The fact that the provision was printed on the back of the receipt does not prevent it from limiting the carrier's liability where it was made a part of the contract by reference and there was no intent or tendency to deceive.[80] In order to effect a limitation of liability, however, the provisions relied on must be clear and free from ambiguity.[81] Where several receipts containing limitations of the carrier's liability are given for property consigned, each receipt constitutes a special contract for the transportation of the property named therein, so that a limitation of liability on a receipt applies only to the property described therein.[82]

While it is held or said in a number of decisions, considered infra § 254, that the possession of the receipt is merely prima facie evidence of the shipper's assent to the stipulations contained therein, the general rule seems to be that his acceptance of the receipt is conclusive on the shipper and will estop him from denying the acceptance of the contract with its limitation, and, accordingly, the shipper cannot be heard to say that he did not know of the limitations in the contract of shipment,[83] and where no fraud or deception is practiced by the carrier the limitations contained in the receipt, if reasonable and not contrary to public policy, will be binding on the shipper, although he failed to read them.[84] The shipper will not be permitted to say that by reason of his own inattention he did not read the terms and conditions and thereby impose upon the carrier a greater liability than that expressed in the contract,[85] and it has been held that the fact that the shipper was unable to read does not in any way affect the operation of the rule,[86] although it has been said that without any explanatory evidence it is difficult to understand how the carrier can claim a contract in its favor with such a person.[87]

A distinction has been drawn, however, in the matter of the effect of acceptance of receipts, between freight and baggage cases.[88] The effect of

Express Co., 143 A. 37, 4 W.W.Harr.,Del., 16.

Liability resting on contract

The owner of goods shipped in interstate commerce under a limited liability contract, and embezzled by the carrier's employee, cannot avoid the limitation of liability by proving that the shipment and assent to the limitation were without her consent, as the carrier's liability arises only from the contract—Henderson v. Indistinct printing

A receipt in the form of a bill of lading delivered to the shipper of some horses over a railroad contained a clause limiting the liability of the carrier to one hundred dollars on each horse, but the shipper denied having read it. This clause was described in the report as printed over the clauses of the receipt which were in black ink, and at right angles to them. It was itself in red ink, and looked as if it might have been impressed upon the receipt after the latter was printed by some hand or power stamp. The coloring was far from bright, and parts of it, by reason of the size of type, and by reason of its being printed across the black lines of the receipt, could not be read without the most careful inspection. It was held that the shipper was not bound by the conditions in this clause—New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v Sayles, N.Y., 87 F. 444, 32 C.C.A. 485.

Illiteracy of agent

Although shipper's servant, who delivered trunk and took receipt, was illiterate, liability of defendant express company was held limited by amount stated in its receipt, where amount paid for transportation entitled shipper only to such amount under filed tariffs—Kolb v. the acceptance of receipts in baggage cases see infra § 877.

Minority rule. Notwithstanding the general rules heretofore stated, it is held in a number of decisions, independently of statute, that a limitation in a shipping receipt, which is not shown to have been brought to the attention of the shipper at the time of shipment and assented to by him, is not binding, and that assent to a limitation of liability does not arise from acceptance of the receipt by the shipper, in silence.[89] If, however, a shipper has actual knowledge of a clause in a shipping receipt which limits the liability of the carrier to an amount therein stated, and he accepts the receipt in silence, such acceptance estops him from afterward asserting the value to be greater.[90]

Effect of statutory provisions. Under a statute providing that a party who accepts a contract for carriage with a knowledge of its terms assents to the limitation stated therein on the amount of the carrier's liability in case the property is lost or injured, the knowledge prescribed by the statute may be constructive as well as actual;[91] but the mere acceptance of a receipt containing a limitation of the amount of the carrier's liability will not, as a matter of law, charge the consignor with a knowledge of such limitation.[92]

Under a statutory provision that a common carrier cannot limit its legal liability by any notice given by publication or by entry on receipts given, but may make an express contract and will then be governed thereby, an express contract is necessary, and the shipper, by the mere acceptance of a receipt, is not bound by the limitations therein contained.[93] It is said that an express contract made with the shipper of the goods limiting the liability of the carrier must be made independently of the receipt given for the goods and must be proved independently thereof, as any other contract is proved when entered into by two or more parties;[94] but this principle does not prevent the parties from using the terms set out in the receipt as a basis on which an express contract may be made.[95]

Under a statute which provides that, when any property is delivered to a common carrier to be transported, it shall not be lawful for the carrier to limit its common-law liability by any stipulation expressed in the receipt given for the property, the mere acceptance by the shipper of a receipt containing limitations of liability does not constitute an assent to such limitations nor prevent him from recovering full compensation for loss or injury.[96] In order to bind the shipper, it must appear that he was aware of the restriction in the receipt.[97] A clause in a receipt limiting and restricting the carrier's liability, if understandingly assented to by the shipper, is, however, binding.[98]

The effect of the Cummins amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act was to nullify provisions limiting liability contained in public tariffs and in bills of lading, and the second Cummins amendment

Addoms v. Weir, 108 N.Y.S. 146, 56 Misc. 487.

"Cases where parties, proposing to have articles of property transported by a common carrier, deliberately enter into some necessary contract relating to the transportation, differ materially from those cases of travelers who commit their trunks, or articles of baggage, to an agent of some express or transfer company, and receive at the moment some paper, which, as it has been said, amounts simply to a voucher enabling them to follow and identify their property. (Madan v. Sherard, 73 N.Y. 329, 29 Am.R. 153.) The difference is very obvious in the circumstances, which, in the one case, usually admit of no negotiation, or discussion; while, in the other, the shipment of the property is a matter of arrangement, with full opportunity for deliberate action."—Zimmer v. New York, etc., R. Co., 33 N.E. 642, 137 N.Y. 460, 463.

What is a freight shipment

Where one shipped his trunk by express and agreed to pay a specified sum for the expressage when delivered at his residence, and there was nothing to show that he was about to become a passenger of the carrier, the shipment was one of express freight, and not a baggage matter, binding him, in the absence of fraud or imposition, to the printed receipt given him limiting the carrier's liability to a specified sum.—Baum v. did not change the first amendment in that regard.[99]

b. Bills of Lading in General

Generally, although the contrary has been asserted, valid stipulations limiting the carrier's liability which are embodied in a bill of lading accepted by the shipper are binding upon him although he has not formally assented thereto. Limitations of liability by stipulations in bills of lading are governed by applicable statutory provisions.

A common carrier may limit its common-law liability by receiving the shipment for transportation, subject to all the terms and conditions of the uniform bill of lading.[1] The nature of the bill of lading as constituting a contract between the carrier and the shipper will be discussed infra § 123; and the discussion here is confined to the effect of provisions in such a contract stating the limitations, if any, under which the goods are received by the carrier for transportation.

Although the contrary view has been taken,[2] as a general rule, in the absence of controlling statutes providing otherwise, if a formal bill of lading is executed by the carrier, delivered to the shipper and accepted by him as evidence of the terms of shipment, valid stipulations embodied therein limiting the carrier's liability will be binding on the parties, and no formal assent to the limitation of liability by signature to the bill of lading, or otherwise, is essential on the part of the shipper;[3] nor is it necessary in view of the rule stated infra § 254, that the stipulation limiting the carrier's liability be expressly called to the shipper's attention, since, as there shown, it will be presumed that the shipper was apprised of the contents of the instrument, and that he assented to its terms; and he will not be heard to say that stipulations therein limiting the carrier's liability were not known and assented to by him. Thus he cannot show, to defeat the exemption, that he did not read the instrument;[4] and this principle is especially applicable where he signed the bill of lading or special contract limiting the carrier's common-law liability,[5] notwithstanding he executed it hurriedly and without due consideration,[6] or where for several years previous he had been receiving bills of lading in the same form and terms as the one in question.[7] So, where the shipper obtains a blank bill of lading from the carrier's agent and fills it out and presents it to such agent for his signature, and the agent signs it, the shipper is conclusively bound by its terms and cannot be heard to say that he had not acquainted himself therewith.[8] Moreover, knowledge of the fact that such stipulations are usually contained in the bill of lading issued by the carrier will affect the shipper with notice thereof in a particular case.[9] Failure to deliver bills of lading to shipper, who left the country without direction as to their delivery, does not prevent the carrier from claiming the benefit of exemptions therein.[10]

Nevertheless, the provisions assuming to limit the liability of the carrier should be so stated that they may be easily comprehended; and if not they are inoperative.[11] Furthermore, the shipper is not bound where he is prevented by the carrier's fraud from reading or otherwise obtaining a knowledge of the terms of the bill of lading,[12] or where he did not assent but specifically objected to the limited liability clause and signed only after he was told that no other contract could be given to him.[13] That a shipper filed a claim for damages with the carrier's agent does not show an acceptance of the bill of lading limiting the carrier's liability, where the shipper informed the agent he had not signed the bill, and the agent refused to take up the claim until the bill of lading was filed therewith.[14]

Provisions of a bill of lading issued for a contemplated shipment will be binding if the shipment is made thereunder.[15]

Limitations in a bill of lading issued to and accepted by a third person not the agent of the shipper are not binding on the latter, if he did not know of them until after the loss or injury.[16]

Effect of statutory provisions. Under a statute providing that where a consignor receives a bill and makes no objection neither he nor any person who accepts delivery of the goods or seeks to enforce any provision of the bill shall be allowed to deny that he is bound by any lawful condition thereof, a shipper accepting a bill without objection is deemed to have assented to the lawful limitations of liability contained therein and is bound by them;[17] and this rule applies whether or not the shipper or his agent actually knew what was in the bill.[18]

Where a statute provides that when any property is delivered to a common carrier to be transported, it shall not be lawful for the carrier to limit its common-law liability by any stipulation expressed in the receipt given for the property, it is held that where a limitation of the carrier's common-law liability is contained in a bill of lading which in its entirety constitutes both a receipt and a contract, the mere acceptance by the shipper of the bill of lading does not amount to an assent thereto so as to make the restriction binding.[19] In order that restrictions contained in a bill of lading shall be binding, it is essential that either the shipper or his agent at the time of making the contract of shipment knew the terms and conditions of the bill of lading and assented thereto.[20] Such assent must be shown by evidence dehors the instrument.[21] The fact that the shipper filled up the bill of lading on a blank furnished by the initial carrier is only evidence tending to show assent.[22] However, if the shipper accepts a receipt or bill of lading containing limitations of the carrier's common-law liability, with a full knowledge of its terms, and with intent to assent thereto, he is bound by such limitations whether or not he signed the receipt;[23] and if the parties specially contract with reference to limitation of liability, the shipper is bound by the instrument, and cannot relieve himself from its terms by reason of ignorance thereof.[24] By the

No time to read

Where a shipper is furnished cars for shipment of live stock, without requiring him to sign any written contract, and a contract is presented to him for signature after the stock is in the car and about to start, and where he or the person signing it does not know its contents, and has no time to read it, and signs to secure passes to attend the stock, such contract would not be a contract of the shipper, and the limitation restricting liability of the initial carrier to damages on its own line is not binding.—Atchison, T. & S. enactment of the Carmack amendment, as to all cases within its operation, such statute and the decisions construing it are superseded, and the shipper is conclusively presumed to know the terms of the bill of lading and the published rate filed with the interstate commerce commission.[25]

Construing a statute providing that a common carrier cannot limit his legal liability by any notice given, either by publication or by entry on receipts given or tickets sold, but may make an express contract and will then be governed thereby, it is held, with reference to bills of lading, that a mere acceptance by the shipper of a bill of lading containing limitations of the carrier's common-law liability will not bind the shipper, but that such limitations must be expressly assented to by the shipper.[26] Where, however, the shipper himself filled out the blanks in the bill and then tendered it to the carrier for signature, it was held that, when signed and delivered to the shipper, it created a special contract as to the limitation of liability which was binding on the shipper;[27] and where a special contract is incorporated in the bill of lading which is signed by both parties on a consideration, the requirements of the statute are satisfied.[28] At least there must be an express contract.[29]

c. Stipulations in Bill of Lading or Receipt after Delivery for Shipment

If the bill of lading or receipt is delivered after receipt of the goods for shipment, stipulations therein limiting liability are ineffective in the absence of circumstances making it apparent that such limitations were contemplated by both parties at the time of making the contract

To be binding as a part of the contract of shipment the stipulation limiting liability must be embodied in the contract made at the time the goods are shipped. If without any receipt or bill of lading being issued the goods are accepted by the carrier for transportation, its common-law liability attaches, and the subsequent delivery to, and acceptance by, the shipper or his agent of a receipt or bill of lading containing such stipulation will not constitute a part of a binding contract, for in such case there is no consideration for the subsequent agreement,[30] and this rule applies even though the receipt or bill of lading was delivered at the shipper's request.[31] The doctrine that acceptance of a receipt or bill of lading containing stipulations limiting liability implies assent thereto,[32] or that prior negotiations are merged in a subsequent written contract,[33] has no application in such a case. It has been said that this principle is especially applicable to an action brought by the consignee, where, at the time the contract was made, it was agreed that the rights of the consignee should not be affected.[34] Furthermore, a recovery may be had for a breach of the parol contract without suing in equity to have the written contract reformed.[35]

Limitation of rule. If there is an understanding arising out of the course of business by which bills of lading are to be delivered for goods shipped which contain stipulations limiting liability, then it may be presumed that the shipment in such course of business is made on the terms of such a bill of lading, and the stipulations therein will be binding.[36] So a receipt in the form of a contract of shipment containing a limitation of liability constitutes a binding contract, where it was delivered and accepted at the time the charges were prepaid, pursuant to the understanding of the parties, even

Delivery after loss of goods

Fact that carrier's agent prepared and signed receipt for goods, which contained agreement as to released value, shippers knowing nothing of its preparation, and it not having been delivered to them until four or five months after shipment and loss of goods, was held not a declaration or agreement as to value such as would sustain carrier's defense of limited liability.—American Ry. though the goods had been actually shipped prior to such prepayment, since in such case the transaction is not complete until the charges are prepaid and the receipt delivered.[37]

§ 92. Agency in Making Contracts

An agent authorized to ship goods has implied authority to make a shipping contract involving a limitation on the carrier's liability; and this rule applies to a consignor contracting for the consignee, but not ordinarily to teamsters employed merely to deliver goods for shipment or to contracts made by the consignee, although unauthorized contracts may be ratified.

One who has authority to ship goods for another has thereby implied authority to make a contract for their shipment involving a limitation of the carrier's liability;[38] and a carrier is not bound by any private instructions given by the shipper to his agent limiting the agent's authority to bind the shipper;[39] nor is it material that the carrier knew of the agent's ignorance of the value of the goods if it acted in good faith.[40] It has been held, however, that an agent's authority to ship goods does not include the power to limit their value where such limitation does not affect the carriage charges.[41] Moreover, where the consignor makes a contract with the carrier for shipment before the goods are delivered, the agent who delivers the goods thereafter has no authority to accept a bill of lading which contains limitations of liability varying the contract already agreed on.[42] As to the general authority of an agent of the shipper to make contracts with the carrier see the title Agency § 104.

While the general rule has been applied as to a drayman or like person hired by the shipper to deliver the goods to the carrier for transportation,[43]

Cases distinguished

(1) "It is claimed by appellee that the limitation in the bill of lading to $10 per 100 pounds was not binding upon him, because the bill of lading was executed by Whitney and not pursuant to any authority given by appellee. The latter cites the case of New v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 171 Ill.App. 488. In that case, however, the teamster who signed the bill of lading was only employed to 'move the household goods from South Ottawa to the Rock Island depot', and the court said that it was clear the railroad knew that the plaintiff (the owner) was the consignor. In the instant case, Holmes, who employed Whitney to take the property to the railroad company and ship it to Chicago, and who gave him the money to pay the freight, was acting as an agent for appellee. It cannot be said, reasonably, that there was any obligation

it has been held that the mere employment of one as drayman, cartman, or teamster to deliver goods to a common carrier for shipment does not of itself give him authority to make any contract in behalf of the shipper, or to assent to any proposition on the part of the carrier to qualify his liability,[44] since under these circumstances the duty and authority of the drayman, the cartman, or the teamster, as the case may be, ends with the delivery of the goods to the carrier.[45] A wide difference, it is said, exists between the instructions given to a personal agent to cause goods to be shipped and the mere employment of a carrier to carry goods to a shipping office.[46] A fortiori a cartman cannot be presumed to have authority to enter into a contract limiting the carrier's liability where his employer sends a complete shipping order with the goods to be shipped.[47] However, where a course of business extending over several years had grown up between the shipper and the carrier whereby the drayman in every instance executed the ordinary release of valuation and exemption from damages beyond a certain sum, he must be considered the shipper's agent for making the contract of shipment, and as such has authority to bind him.[48]

Contract by consignor for consignee. Although there is some authority to the contrary,[49] according to the weight of authority it is generally assumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that a consignor has authority to make special contracts with the carrier as to the terms of shipment, and the consignee will be bound by any reasonable stipulation limiting the carrier's liability on the contract made by the consignor.[50] The carrier is not bound to inquire as to the consignor's authority, but is entitled to assume that it exists.[51] This is especially so if the consignee accepts the benefits of the special contract.[52] If the consignor acting for the consignee exceeds his authority in consenting to limitations on the carrier's liability, the carrier cannot be made to suffer thereby, unless actual notice of such fact is brought home to it.[53]

Contract made by consignee. The converse of the rule just stated is not necessarily true. The consignor is not bound by a contract made by the carrier with the consignee unless he has assented thereto.[54]

Ratification of unauthorized contract. The shipper may ratify an unauthorized contract entered into by a cartman or a teamster[55] or other person,[56] but to constitute a ratification there must be full knowledge by the shipper of all the material circumstances.[57]

§ 93. Livestock Shipments

Generally, although the rule is not without exceptions, one arranging to ship live stock for another is considered to have authority to make contracts limiting the carrier's liability.

on the appellant to make an investigation and undertake to discover whether Whitney or Holmes were authorized to ship goods Whitney simply carried out the instructions of Holmes and Holmes undertook to do what appellee had requested, and it would seem that the latter is now estopped from disputing that part of the contract which provided for a reduced rate of transportation and the limitation of liability on the part of the carrier."—Button v. 57. Mo—Hunter v. American Ry. Express Co., App., 4 S.W.2d 847.

While it has been held that an agent to ship live stock is authorized only to ship at the regular rate unless the entire matter be left to him, or the circumstances be such that power to ship at a less rate whereby the carrier's liability was limited could be inferred, and that a mere showing that an agent of the shipper signed a bill of lading limiting the carrier's liability is insufficient to establish his authority,[58] as a general rule, one who arranges for the transportation of live stock belonging to another, at his request, must, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be considered his agent for that purpose with authority to make a contract for transportation with the carrier limiting the carrier's common-law liability.[59] The owner will be presumed to have known and assented to the provisions of the contract.[60]

It has been held that as a matter of law persons accompanying a shipment of stock during transportation are not authorized to execute a contract limiting the carrier's liability,[61] and that the carrier is not justified in assuming that such a person had such authority, particularly where an oral contract to receive, transport, and deliver the property involved had already been made with the owner.[62] On the other hand, such contracts have been held to bind the owner under certain circumstances.[63]

§ 94. Necessity of Giving Shipper Option between Modes of Shipment

Generally a limitation of liability in a contract is not valid unless the shipper was offered the choice between such contract and one imposing on the carrier the full common-law liability.

In order to give validity to a limited liability contract the carrier should, at the time of entering into the contract, hold itself out as being in readiness to transport the freight tendered with or without such limitation, and allow the shipper the choice between the limited liability contract and one imposing on the carrier the full common-law liability; and if this is not done, the contract is void and the limitation is inoperative,[64] as under these circumstances it cannot be said that the contract is freely and fairly entered into, and the carrier has by its own wrongful act prevented the making of a lawful contract binding upon the parties.[65] So, where the tariff of a carrier provided for two kinds of service in the shipment of perishables, under which the shipper could assume responsibility for certain damages, or, by paying an increased rate, could require the carrier to

Ocean and land shipment

A carrier is not permitted to limit its liability for loss occasioned by its negligence where only one rate is offered to the shipper, so that he has no choice which can be made the basis of an estoppel, and therefore the provision of a bill of lading for ocean and land shipment limiting the value of the goods, even if it be construed to have been carried into the uniform bill of lading for the land shipment, does not limit the land carrier's liability for loss resulting from its negligence, where its rate schedules stated only one rate for those goods.—Union Pac. R. Co. v. Burke, 41 S.Ct. 283, 255 U.S. 317, 65 L.Ed. 656, affirming Burke v. Union Pac. R. Co., 124 N.E. 119, 226 N.Y. 534, which reversed 166 N.Y.S. 100, 178 App.Div. 783 assume the responsibility, it was primarily the duty of the carrier to accept the shipment under its ordinary common-law liability expressed in the second option, when such service was requested by the shipper; but the carrier is not liable for such damage to goods shipped under the first option notwithstanding its refusal to accept the shipment under the second option, where such refusal was excused by an unusual, unforeseen, and unavoidable shortage of cars suitable for the requested service.[66] It is only when the common carrier acting as such seeks to secure relief from liabilities imposed on it by law in that capacity that it is necessary that the shipper be given an option as to the terms of the contract, however;[67] as will be shown infra § 117, the general rules respecting limitation of the liability of a common carrier do not apply to a carrier not acting within the scope of its duty as common carrier.

In considering whether a shipper had an opportunity to choose between the common-law rate and the limited liability rate, it is held, the question is not what the contract recites in respect to the matter, but whether he had in fact a chance to choose between his common-law rate and a lower rate with limited liability.[68] It is not essential that the alternative should be actually presented to the shipper, however;[69] nor is it material that he did not know of the choice if such choice existed;[70] it is sufficient if it would have been given had he demanded it.[71] Where the shipper exercises his option of choosing which of two rates he will ship by, his right to damages will be determined in accordance with any reasonable stipulations accompanying the rate under which the shipment is made.[72]

§ 95. Consideration

a. Necessity
b. Sufficiency

a. Necessity

A contractual stipulation relieving the carrier from its common-law liability must be supported by some sufficient consideration.

Inasmuch as the carrier is by law bound to carry at a reasonable rate for all who may apply without any limitation of common-law liability, a stipulation relieving him to any extent from the liability imposed by law must be supported by some sufficient consideration, and in the absence of such consideration the stipulation will not be valid,[73]

Limitation as to value

(1) It is frequently stated that a consideration is necessary to sustain a contract limiting the liability of the carrier as to value.—Der Bogosian v. Atchison, T. & S F. Ry. Co, Mo, 202 S.W 1078—Hull v Chicago, B. & Q R Co, 208 S.W 494, 200 Mo App 392—Wilson v. Chicago Great Western R. Co, Mo App, 190 S.W 22—10 C.J. p 166 note 77.

(2) This rule applies to a contract providing that in case of loss the damage for which the carrier shall be liable shall be computed on the basis of the value of the goods at the time and place of shipment.—New York, C. & St L Ry Co. v The Euclid Builders Supply Co, 11 Ohio App 196—10 C.J. p 177 note 63.

(3) A bill of lading which limited carrier's liability to a stipulated amount per package unless higher value was declared, in which case either declared value or market value at place of shipment, whichever was less, was taken, was void as without consideration in not giving the shipper a choice of rates, since, even though the shipper placed a higher valuation thereon and paid a correspondingly higher rate, he could not recover more than the value of the goods at the time and place of shipment.—F. A. Straus & Co. v. Canadian Pac. Ry. Co, 173 N.E 564, 254 N.Y. 407, modifying 238 N.Y.S. 50, 227 App Div. 316, which modified 234 N.Y.S. 622, 134 Misc 439—Magid v. Compagnie General Transatlantique, 254 N.Y.S. 1, 233 App Div 515, affirmed 182 N.E. 167, 259 N.Y. 529.

notwithstanding the contract recites that it is based on a consideration;[74] and, even where the carrier contracts to transport property under a limited liability for a good consideration, such as a reduced rate, such contract is of no effect where the carrier did not in fact transport the property at a reduced rate.[75]

b. Sufficiency

To constitute a sufficient consideration for a special limited liability contract, the services rendered by the carrier or the charge for carriage must be different from what they would be if there were no special contract.

There is not a sufficient consideration for a stipulation limiting the carrier's common-law liability where the services rendered by the carrier and the charges for carriage are in no respect different from what they would be if there were no special contract.[76] So mere acceptance of goods and an agreement to ship them do not constitute a sufficient consideration,[77] the reason for this being that the carrier is bound, on the shipper's demand, to perform the transportation without exacting from the shipper an agreement to relieve the carrier from any part of its common-law liability.[78] Furthermore, a special contract limiting the liability of the carrier issued and accepted after the shipment is unsupported by consideration unless the subsequent execution and issuance was authorized by prior agreement.[79]

A pass entitling the shipper to free transportation is a sufficient consideration, however,[80] unless the shipper was entitled under the law to accompany the goods if accepted for shipment;[81] and in the absence of statute an agreement by the carrier to transport the goods shipped not only over its own line but over that of a connecting carrier is a sufficient consideration, as the carrier is not bound at common law to transport goods over any line but its own,[82] although, as shown infra § 405, by the construction placed on the Carmack amendment, the common law is changed so far as interstate shipments are concerned, and the carrier is bound to make a contract for through shipment over connecting lines, so that it would seem that so far as interstate shipments are concerned an agreement of an initial carrier to ship goods over the line of a connecting carrier will constitute no consideration for a limitation of liability.

Reduced freight rates. A lower freight rate is generally held to be a sufficient consideration for a limited liability contract,[83] and no consideration need be shown for such a contract other than the Choice of rates

Where the carrier offers the shipper the choice of two rates, the higher one for carriage subject to common-law liability, and the lower one for carriage subject to certain exemptions from that liability, the lower rate was sufficient consideration for the exemption of the carrier's liability, especially when the exemption did not include the carrier's negligence.—Simmons Hardware Co. v. Southern Ry. Co., C.C.A.Mo., 279 F. 929, certiorari denied 43 S.Ct. 96, 260 U.S. 739, 67 L.Ed. 490.

lower rates in force for shipments made thereunder.[84] However, such concession in charges must be actual and not fictitious;[85] and notwithstanding the recital in a contract of shipment that the limitations are made in consideration of a reduced rate or other valuable consideration, if it is shown that there is no such reduced rate or other valuable consideration, the carrier is liable just as if the contract had contained no such stipulation.[86]

A stipulated difference in the shipping rate affords a sufficient consideration to support a contract limiting liability only where the shipper has a bona fide opportunity of making a choice of rates.[87] Where the carrier has but one regular rate applicable for a given class of property, it is not a reduced or special rate, such as will serve as a consideration for the limitation of its common-law liability.[88] There is no reduced rate authorizing a limitation of liability shown by a contract, where the reduced rate named in the contract is a reduction from a rate based on the weight of the article shipped, while the limitation applies to the article regardless of weight[89] So it has been held that a contract reciting that the price charged for transportation is "at the rate of tariff per cwt." must be construed to mean that the price charged is the full tariff rate and shows a want of consideration for a limitation of liability, notwithstanding a recital that the rate charged was less than the rate charged for shipments transported at the carrier's risk.[90] Where the carrier estimates the weight of the goods shipped at less than the estimate furnished it by the shipper, and incorporates its estimate in the contract, and bases the freight rate on such estimate, it is estopped to claim that by reason of the fact that the goods ran over the estimated weight the shipment was made at a reduced freight rate which entitled it to limit its common-law liability.[91]

§ 96. Reasonableness of Limitation

Contractual limitations of a carrier's liability must be just and reasonable, and not contrary to public policy.

A carrier cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from liability, unless such exemption is just and reasonable,[92] and unless the contract is freely and fairly made[93] and is not inconsistent with pub-

Schedule containing two rates

Where the published and approved schedule of a railroad's rates for carrying live stock contains two rates, one, lower, where contracts limiting liability must be entered into, another, higher, where no contract limiting liability is required, the difference between the two rates is a sufficient consideration for the contract limiting liability; and where the first schedule of rates of a railroad, applying to it and other roads, indicated two kinds of contracts, at owner's risk, one where the agreed value was within a certain amount, the other, where the value exceeded the amount and did not exceed eight hundred dollars, and then provided for a contract at the carrier's risk, and the fixed rates first given in the schedule were made to apply only on shipments of ordinary live stock where contracts were executed by shippers on blanks furnished by the companies, the latter provision of the schedule authorized a contract covering an interstate shipment of live stock in the form of the several blanks of the several railroads—Bilby v. lic policy.[94] No contractual limitation is reasonable which is subversive of public policy.[95] Whether a limited liability contract is reasonable is in all cases to be determined by the facts and circumstances of the particular case.[96] A provision exempting the carrier from liability for loss from any cause whatever would be against public policy and void as an attempt on the part of a common carrier to relieve itself from its public duties,[97] and, as shown infra § 113 b, as an attempt to relieve itself from the consequences of negligence.

§ 97. Right to Limit Liability

a. In general
b. Effect of special constitutional and statutory provisions

a. In General

In the absence of prohibitory constitutional or statutory provisions, reasonable limitations of the carrier's common-law liability are permissible.

While considerations of public policy as shown supra § 71, have been potent in influencing the courts to recognize a rule of liability, in the case of common carriers, much stricter than that recognized as applying in the case of ordinary bailees, the courts have not thought it necessary to deny the parties to a contract of carriage the right to exonerate the carrier from its extraordinary liability, where there is no constitutional or statutory provision forbidding it; and, subject to the rule stated supra § 96 that such limitation must be reasonable, the general proposition has been recognized that by special agreement, or by notice to the shipper acquiesced in by him, the common carrier may limit its common-law liability.[98] Accordingly, it is stated as a general proposition in many decisions that a common carrier may by contract limit its liability, except for damages or loss resulting from the negligence of the carrier or its agents or servants.[99] However, a common carrier cannot, by declaring or stipulating that it shall not be so considered, divest itself of the liability attached to the fixed legal character of its occupation.[1]

Briefly summarized, the reasons assigned for permitting common carriers to limit their common-law liability by contract are: (1) Changed methods and conditions of transportation.[2] (2) The right of every citizen to control his own affairs and to make such contracts with relation to his property as may seem beneficial to him.[3] (3) The absence of any interest the public can have in requiring the responsibility of insurance to accompany the service of transportation, in the face of a special agreement for its relinquishment.[4] (4) The great hardship on the carrier in certain special cases, where goods of great value were delivered to it without notice of their character, and where loss happened by sheer accident, without any possibility of fraud or collusion on its part, such as by collisions at sea, accidental fire, etc.[5] (5) The fact that the relaxation of the rule enables the carrier to reduce its rates of compensation, thus proportionately relieving the transportation of produce and merchandise from some of the burden with which it is loaded.[6]

In this Title the right of an initial carrier to limit its liability to its own line is considered infra § 407; and the right of a connecting carrier to the benefit of a limited liability clause in the contract of carriage, infra §§ 432, 433. What limitations of liability are permissible are discussed at length infra §§ 98–111.

b. Effect of Special Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

(1) State provisions
(2) Federal provisions

(1) State Provisions

As regards intra-state shipments, a contract for limitation of liability made in violation of a state constitutional or statutory prohibition thereof is void.

State statutes authorizing carriers to limit their liability by express contract do not affect the operation of the general rule as laid down in the preceding subdivision of this section.[7]

In some states, however, carriers are expressly prohibited from limiting their liability by contract, and any attempted limitation thus prohibited is void,[8] and, as against such a constitutional or statutory prohibition, it is immaterial that there is a consideration for the limitation of liability in a reduced rate of transportation.[9] It has been held,

Dawkins, 95 So. 188, 190, 209 Ala. 45.

Exemption from liability

Limitation on carrier's liability for loss or damage to intra-state shipment constitutes exemption from liability, and is therefore ineffective under statute prohibiting carrier from exempting itself from common-law liability.—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Osborne, 153 S.E. 865, 154 Va. 477.

"Ordinary live stock"

Under a statute prohibiting a carrier from limiting liability on ordinary live stock received for intra-state transportation and defining the term "ordinary live stock" to include all cattle, swine, sheep, goats, horses, and mules except such as are chiefly valuable for breeding, racing, show purposes, or other special uses, horses owned by Indians and shipped for use in Indian village presentation at fair, which were not chiefly valuable for breeding, racing, show purposes, or other special uses, were held "ordinary live stock" and a contract attempting to limit liability thereon was invalid.—Wall-A-Hee v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 41 P.2d 786, 180 Wash. 656.

9. U.S.—Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Solan, 18 S.Ct. 289, 169 U.S. 133, 42 L.Ed. 688.

however, that constitutional and statutory provisions of this character are not intended to prevent freedom of contract as to matters merely incidental to the contract of transportation and not peculiar or necessary to it,[10] this rule being particularly applicable, as shown supra § 64, to contracts requiring the shipper to accompany and care for live stock. So also it has been held that such provisions have no application where loss or injury occurs after the carrier's liability as such has terminated and where its only responsibility is that of a warehouseman.[11]

Interstate shipments. Before the enactment of the Carmack amendment it was held that these statutes were applicable to interstate as well as to intra-state shipments,[12] except where, as is the case in some statutes, an intent is indicated that they are to be restricted in their application to intra-state shipments.[13] However, as shown in the following subdivision of this section, the so-called Carmack amendment has entirely nullified the effect of these statutes so far as interstate and certain foreign shipments are concerned, although it is inoperative as regards intra-state shipments.

(2) Federal Provisions

The Carmack amendment and second Cummins amendment permit, with certain exceptions, modification of the common-law liability of a carrier in so far as interstate shipments are concerned, but do not affect state laws relating to intra-state shipments.

As shown in the C.J.S. title Commerce § 92, also 10 C.J. p 136 note 39–p 137 note 42, and 12 C.J. p 86 notes 41, 44, 49, the right of the carrier to limit its liability by special contract in respect of interstate shipments depends entirely on the provisions of the so-called Carmack amendment and the various amendments thereto, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 (11). The liability imposed by the original Carmack amendment was the liability imposed by the common law upon a common carrier, and could be limited or qualified by special contract with the shipper, provided the limitation or qualification was just and reasonable, and did not exempt from loss or responsibility due to negligence.[14] Under the Act of March 4, 1915, c 176, 38 U S St. at L. p 1196, c 176, known as the first Cummins amendment, which expressly forbade any limitation of liability by the carrier for loss or injury to an interstate shipment of goods or to goods shipped from the United States to an adjacent foreign country, except as to concealed goods the value of which the carrier required the shipper specifically to state in writing,[15] but which did not affect rights of ac-

Early diverse views

Before this question was authoritatively settled by the United States supreme court there was great diversity of view in the state courts. See 10 C.J. p 137 notes 45, 46.

15. Value not stated

Under the first Cummins amendment a carrier could limit its liability only by requiring the shipper to state specifically in writing the value of the goods shipped, and a mere recital in the receipt or bill of lading that liability was limited, unless tion accruing under former statutes,[16] provisions in public tariffs and bills of lading limiting liability were nullified,[17] and the express provision of the statute could not be defeated by any construction based on the convenience of the clause nor any argument based upon the history of the statute or the Carmack amendment or upon the policy of the later Cummins amendment, Act Congr. Aug. 9, 1916, 39 U.S.St. at L. p 441, c 301, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 (11).[18] Under the amendment last referred to, which apparently restored to a large extent the operation of the Carmack amendment as it had been judicially construed, it is held that the liability of a carrier as an insurer may be modified by an agreement fairly entered into with the shipper,[19] but such agreement must not include exemption of the carrier from liability due to its own negligence or that of any of its employees acting within the scope of their employment;[20] and the same rule applies under subsequent amendments such as the Transportation Act of 1920.[21]

Intra-state shipments. The Carmack amendment and the decisions of the supreme court of the United States construing and applying that legislation do not change or affect the laws of a state with relation to contracts, obligations, and liabilities of carriers with regard to shipments which are exclusively intra-state.[22]

§ 98. What Limitations of Liability Permissible

Limitations which do not restrict a carrier's common-law liability are permissible and not against public policy; and among such limitations, restrictions exempting from loss resulting from leakage, strike, mob, or riot are permissible.

Generally speaking, limitations which do not restrict the carrier's common-law liability are not against public policy or unlawful.[23] Thus, the contract of carriage may provide that, unless caused in whole or in part by its own negligence or that of its agents, the carrier shall not be liable for loss, damage, or delay caused by the nature of the Articles not specifically rated

A provision in a carrier's tariff of rates as filed, published, and approved by the interstate commerce commission that certain articles, including precious metals or articles manufactured therefrom, will not be accepted for shipment and a provision of such carrier's bill of lading, providing that articles not specifically rated would not be carried, and that the carrier would not be liable therefor, unless a special agreement and stipulated value was indorsed thereon, although amounting to rules and regulations, are not forbidden by the Carmack amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act as amended by the first and second Cummins amendments, making interstate carriers liable for loss, damage, or injury, and prohibiting contracts, receipts, rules, or regulations, etc., exempting carriers from such liability, especially in view of the further provision of that amendment that it should not apply to property concerning which the carrier should be expressly authorized or required by the interstate commerce commission to maintain rates dependent on declared value—Payne v. property or defect or inherent vice therein, and this is a reasonable and legal limitation upon the liability of the carrier permissible under both the common law and the Carmack amendment.[24] Furthermore a stipulation exempting the carrier from loss by leakage is reasonable.[25] Subject to the general rule, stated infra § 99, that a carrier cannot limit its liability for loss or injury caused by its own negligence, a carrier may by fair and reasonable agreement restrict its liability for losses which are the proximate result of strikes,[26] mobs,[27] or riots,[28] even though a strike is in existence at the time the contract is made;[29] and this rule is not affected by the Interstate Commerce Act as amended by the Carmack and second Cummins amendments,[30] although in a case controlled by the first Cummins amendment such a limitation was not permissible.[31] Whether other limitations of liability are permissible is discussed under specific heads infra §§ 99–111.

Questions relating to limitation of liability, as to notice of claim are considered infra §§ 233–241, and as to time to sue infra §§ 242–243.

§ 99. Negligence

a. Common-law rule
b. Effect of special constitutional and statutory regulations

a. Common-Law Rule

Under the common law based on considerations of public policy, a carrier cannot limit its liability for loss or injury caused by its own negligence. This rule prohibits contracts relieving the carrier from liability for the negligence of its servants or contracts providing for partial exemption from liability; and it applies to carriers of live stock as well as of inanimate property.

In the absence of statute, it is well settled that whatever limitations against its common-law liability are permissible to a carrier, it cannot limit its liability for injury to or loss of goods shipped, where such injury or loss is caused by its own negligence.[32] This is the common-law doctrine and

Degree of diligence required by law of a carrier is a matter over which it has no control and in which the public is interested —Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Patterson, 84 So. 471, 17 Ala.App. 305.

Gross negligence or ordinary negligence

(1) Although in some early cases some courts drew a distinction between ordinary negligence and gross negligence, and sustained exemptions so far as they did not exonerate the carrier from gross or willful neglect, or from fraud on its own part or on the part of its servants, this assumed distinction has been repudiated and the general rule prevails that the carrier cannot exempt itself from liability on account of negligence, whether gross or ordinary —Summerlin v Seaboard Air Line R Co, 47 So. 557, 56 Fla 687, 131 Am.S R. 164, 19 L R A.,N.S., 191 —10 C J. p 157 note 2, p 158 note 3.

(2) When confronted with circumstances due to the elements rendering a carrier unable to make safe delivery of goods consigned to a particular destination, it cannot by contract excuse itself for its gross negligence in wantonly discharging said goods at such point in mud and rain, in a place where they will certainly be destroyed and rendered useless.—Annese v. Baltimore & O R. Co., 105 S E. 807, 87 W.Va. 588, 22 A L R. 869.

In New York

(1) By virtue of the statute considered infra subdivision b of this section, contracts purporting totally to exempt the carrier from liability for negligence are now against the public policy of the state. These statutes supersede the court decisions of this state which expressed a different view and represented the public policy of the state when made —F. A. Straus & Co. v. Canadian Pac. Ry. Co, 173 N E. 564, 254 N Y. 407, modifying 238 N Y.S 50, 227 App Div. 316, modifying 234 N.Y S 622, 134 Misc 439.

(2) Early in the jurisprudence of the state it was announced that a common carrier had no right, by special contract or otherwise, to limit its common-law liability or to evade the consequences of a breach of its duty under the common law, and that a clause in the receipt or bill of lading accepted by the shipper providing that the carrier should not be liable for loss by fire was invalid and of no effect, whether or not the fire was the result of the carrier's negligence —Gould v. Hill, 2 Hill 623, affirming Cole v. Goodwin, 19 Wend 251, 32 Am D. 470.

(3) Later the courts changed their position and held that a carrier might by a special contract fairly entered into limit its liability to specified risks.—Stoddard v Long Island R. Co., 7 N Y Super 180, following New Jersey Steam Nav. Co v. Merchants Bank, R I., 6 How, U. S, 344, 12 L Ed. 465—10 C J p 160 note 16.

(4) Thereafter the doctrine was still further extended and the rule adopted that the carrier could by a special contract stipulate for exemption from liability even for losses resulting from its own negligence. —American Locomotive Co v New York Cent. R. Co., 179 N Y S. 851, 190 App.Div. 372—10 C.J. p 157 note 2 [a], p 160 note 17.

(5) It was as to exemptions from liability for servants' negligence that the New York courts most clearly departed from the weight of authority, by holding such a contract valid. —Magnin v Dinsmore, 62 N Y. 35, 20 Am R. 442.

(6) The theory of the New York cases was that the contract between the carrier and the shipper was purely a private one with which the public had properly no concern, and that if the parties freely and voluntarily made a contract exempting the carrier from all liability, it would be presumed that the carrier parted with a sufficient consideration for the exemption —Smith v. New York Cent. R. Co, 24 N.Y. 222—10 C.J p 160 note 19.

(7) The rule was subject to certain limitations, however. Thus, while the carrier could by contract exempt itself even from liability for negligence, it could not do so by general words, to uphold a limitation of this character the stipulation for exemption was required to be express and explicit.—Boyle v. Bush Terminal R. Co, 104 N.E 983, 210 N.Y. 389, reversing 136 N Y S. 255, 151 App Div 551—Gardiner v New York Cent, etc, R. Co., 94 N E 876, 201 N Y. 387, 34 L R A.,N.S, 826, Ann Cas. 1912B 281—10 C.J. p 160 note 20

(8) Moreover, no stipulation was allowed to protect the carrier from liability for losses resulting from the willful wrongdoing or gross neglect of the carrier or its servants — Keeney v. Grand Trunk R Co, 47 N.Y. 525, affirming 59 Barb. 104—10 C J p 157 note 2 [a], p 161 note 21.

(9) "While the early decisions in this state expressed the public policy of the state at the time, changed conditions have resulted in a change of the public policy of the

it makes no difference that there is no statutory prohibition against contracts of this character,[33] nor does the fact that the carrier gives a special consideration for the stipulation in any way affect the operation of the rule.[34] Such a stipulation, as shown infra § 113 b, being considered as void and of no effect, and in accordance with the principles announced infra § 112 b, a contract containing valid limitations of the carrier's common-law liability will not be construed so as to protect the carrier from the consequences of its own negligence.

The common-law rule rests on considerations of public policy.[35] The undertaking is to carry the goods, and to relieve the shipper from all liability for loss or damage arising from negligence in performing its contract is to ignore the contract itself.[36] The natural tendency of a limitation of liability against negligence is to induce want of care on the part of the carrier in the performance of its duty[37] and to encourage guilty negligence.[38] The shipper and the carrier are not on equal terms; the shipper must send his freight by the common carrier, or not at all; he is therefore entirely at the mercy of the carrier, unless protected by the higher power of the law against being forced into contracts limiting the carrier's liability.[39] Such contracts are wanting in the element of voluntary assent.[40]

Application and extent of rule generally. While a common carrier cannot by contract exempt himself from liability for his own negligence, he is not liable for a failure to perform his duty where no damage results although an attempt was made to exempt himself from liability.[41] As shown infra § 117, the general rule prohibiting limitation of liability for negligence has no application where the railroad company is acting outside the performance of its duty as a common carrier; but the rule has been applied as shown infra § 103, to prevent limitations of liability for negligent delay.

Negligence of servants. The rule is often stated as a prohibition of any contract relieving the carrier from loss or damage caused by its own negligence or misfeasance, or that of its servants;[42] and, as shown infra § 113 b, it has been specifically decided in many cases that no contract limitation will relieve the carrier from responsibility for the negligence, unskillfulness, or carelessness of its employees. Moreover, the rule cannot be evaded by providing in the bill of lading that, when the carrier furnishes the labor to aid the shipper in loading and unloading the goods shipped, such laborers shall be considered the servants of the shipper and that he alone shall be responsible for their negligence.[43]

Transportation of live stock. The rule of law that a common carrier cannot, by contract, relieve itself from liability for its own negligence is applicable to the carrier of live stock as well as of inanimate property.[44] In applying the foregoing state. The rule of freedom of contract, which reflected the public policy of the state in the days of the canal boat and stage coach, has ceased to be applicable under modern conditions"—F. A. Straus & Co. v. Canadian Pac. Ry. Co., 173 N.E. 564, 566, 254 N.Y. 407.

principle it is held that the carrier cannot by stipulation relieve itself from liability for loss of, or damage to, stock due to defective appliances for loading and unloading,[45] or defective facilities for feeding and watering stock being carried over its line.[46]

Partial exemption. The general rule applies as well where the contract provides for partial or limited exemption as where it contemplates total exemption from liability.[47] It would be an idle thing for the courts to declare the principle that contracts for total exemption from such loss are subversive of public policy and void, and at the same time permit and uphold a partial limitation which could avail to prevent anything like adequate and substantial recovery by the shipper.[48] As shown infra § 102 a, however, a fair and just agreement that the carrier's liability for loss or injury to goods intrusted to it for shipment shall not exceed a certain amount agreed to be the value of the goods is valid and will be sustained whether or not the loss or injury is due to the carrier's negligence.

b. Effect of Special Constitutional and Statutory Regulations

Various special constitutional and statutory provisions have been construed to prohibit or not to permit limitations of liability for loss caused by the carrier's negligence.

It is settled that a common carrier has no right to exempt itself from liability for loss or injury which is caused by its own negligence where a statute expressly so provides,[49] where constitutional and statutory provisions forbid any limitation of common-law liability,[50] or where the statute prohibits exemptions from liability although allowing the parties to fix the value of the goods and confining the shipper's recovery to the value so fixed.[51] A similar rule applies where the statute prohibits the insertion of terms and conditions in a bill which impair the carrier's obligation to exercise reasonable care in the transportation and safe-keeping of the goods, provides that no stipulation shall exempt the carrier from liability for damage caused by it, and makes the carrier liable for all loss caused by negligent delay.[52] Where the statute in express terms prohibits common carriers from limiting their liability for loss or injury caused by gross negligence, any limitation of liability against injuries caused by gross negligence is of course inoperative.[53] There is, however, a conflict of opinion as to whether such a statute abrogates the common-law rule as to ordinary negligence; there is some authority to the effect that it does,[54] but also some authority to the effect that the statute is merely declaratory of the common-law rule as to gross negligence and that it does not in any way change the rule as to ordinary negligence.[55]

Federal legislation. Under the federal law a carrier cannot exempt itself from liability for its own negligence or that of its servants in the transportation of property by interstate shipments,[56] and a contract by which it purports to do so can gain no validity from being filed with the interstate commerce commission;[57] nor do the tariff regulations of the carrier avail.[58] Specifically, it has been held that the common-law rule heretofore stated is not in any manner affected by anything in the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887 or in the acts amending it, known as the Elkins Act and the Hepburn Act,[59] the Carmack amendment,[60] the Cummins amendments,[61] or in the Transportation Act of 1920[62] as subsequently amended, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 (11).[63] Indeed it is declared by the supreme court of the United States that the provision of the Carmack amendment making the initial carrier liable to the holder of a shipping receipt for any loss or damage caused by it or by any connecting carrier, and that no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt such a common carrier from the liability hereby imposed is a statutory declaration that a contract of exemption from liability for negligence is against public policy and void.[64] Under the Carmack amendment an agreement to release a carrier for part of a loss due to negligence is no more valid than one by which there is a complete exemption.[65]

ments set out supra §§ 88–96 relating to manner of effecting limitation, consideration, reasonableness, and the like, in the absence of a controlling prohibitory statute it is well settled that a contract exempting the carrier from liability for loss or damage by fire, not due to the carrier's negligence, is valid,[66] nor, in view of the rules stated supra § 97 b, is such contract forbidden by the Carmack amendment[67] or second Cummins amendment,[68] although with respect to an intra-state shipment such a contract is prohibited by a state statute making it unlawful for a carrier, by agreement, to abridge its common-law liabilities.[69] In view of the rule stated infra § 115, a provision in a contract of shipment exempting the carrier from liability for loss by fire not caused by its own negligence or that of its servants may be waived.

§ 101. Injuries to Live Stock

A common carrier of live stock may limit its liability except for loss or damage resulting from negligence.

The exceptional nature of the property and of the loss or damage which may result during its transportation is held to justify a contract by a carrier of live stock limiting its liability, except for such loss or damage as may result from its own negligence or from that of its agents or servants,[70] and this rule applies alike under the Carmack amendment which is fully considered supra § 97 b and under the common law,[71] although such limitations of liability are forbidden under controlling provisions of state constitutions or statutes which prohibit common carriers from contracting away their common-law liability.[72]

Applying the general rule, it has been held that the carrier may by contract stipulate against liability for loss or injury to animals caused by inherent viciousness or fright, as a result of which they may injure themselves or each other,[73] for injuries due to suffocation and heating,[74] cold, heat, or change in weather,[75] fire,[76] dipping or disinfection,[77] want of bedding,[78] or for the risk of loss or damage

Transportation Act of 1920

Under Act to Regulate Commerce § 20, as amended by Acts June 29, 1906, Febr. 25, 1909, June 18, 1910, March 4, 1915, and Aug. 9, 1916, U.S. Comp. St. §§ 8592, 8604a, 8604aa, and incorporated into the Transportation Act of 1920, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20 (11), declaring a common carrier liable to the holder of a receipt or bill of lading for any loss, damage, or injury "caused by it" to property covered thereby, notwithstanding any limitation of liability or agreement as to value therein, the carrier's liability as an insurer may be modified by an agreement fairly entered into with a shipper of live stock, but such agreement must not include exemption from liability due to its own negligence or that of any of its employees acting within the scope of their employment.—Hance Bros. Co. v. American Ry. Express Co., 190 N.Y.S. 530, 116 Misc. 653.

Absence of consideration

Whether under the Carmack and Cummins amendments to the Interstate Commerce Act, a shipper of live stock might, in consideration of lower rates, contract for lower liability, and require owner to prove that the loss was caused by the carrier's negligence, was immaterial where there was no such consideration.—Alexander v. caused by delay,[79] or from any cause beyond the control of the carrier,[80] and, where the duty of loading and unloading is placed upon the carrier, it may stipulate against liability for loss or injury not caused by its negligence but which is occasioned by injuries sustained by animals in loading and unloading,[81] or from overloading,[82] crowding one upon another,[83] or escaping from cars, pens, or vessels.[84] Furthermore, under the Carmack amendment the parties may agree that the carrier shall not be liable for any mistake or inaccuracy in information furnished concerning quarantine regulations, such agreement not being a contract against negligence.[85] It may be observed, however, that no special contract is necessary to protect the carrier from liability for loss or injury due to inherent viciousness or fright, since under the common-law rule stated supra § 79 b the carrier is not liable for such loss. In determining whether a particular attempted limitation of liability is permissible, the general rules discussed supra §§ 88–95 relating to the manner of effecting the limitation, consideration, reasonableness, etc., must be kept in mind and applied.

The right of a carrier of live stock to limit its liability as to value is treated infra § 102, and as against its own negligence or that of its employees, supra § 99 a. Questions relating to limitation of liability by a contract imposing on the shipper the duty to feed and water during transportation are considered supra § 64.

§ 102. Limitation of Liability as to Value

a. Agreed valuation
b. Value not disclosed or stated
c. Invoice price, or value at place of shipment

a. Agreed Valuation

(1) In absence of prohibitory statute
(2) Effect of constitutional or statutory provisions

(1) In Absence of Prohibitory Statute

As a general rule in the absence of controlling statutes to the contrary, reasonable contracts providing that the carrier's liability for loss or injury to goods shall not exceed an agreed valuation are upheld whether or not the carrier's negligence contributed to the damage sustained. A carrier cannot by arbitrary agreement as to valuation limit its liability for a loss or injury due to its negligence.

While the rule as shown by the general rule stated below, is by no means of universal application, the view sustained by the great weight of authority, with respect to both interstate and intra-state shipments, in the absence of controlling statutes to the contrary is that contracts of carriage providing that the carrier's liability for loss or injury to goods intrusted to it for shipment shall not exceed an agreed valuation, when they are fair, open, and reasonable, and made for the purpose of furnishing the basis of the liability assumed, and the rates to be charged for the transportation are valid and will be sustained, whether or not the loss or injury is due to the carrier's negligence.[86]

The real question upon which the division of judicial opinion arises with respect to agreements of the general character under consideration is whether a contract which protects a carrier against the recovery of a larger amount than the agreed value of the property is one relieving it from the consequences of its own negligence.[87] Where the majority rule above stated prevails, it is very generally considered that limitations of this character do not in any respect exempt the carrier from liability for negligence and are not calculated to induce negligence,[88] their only effect being to liquidate the amount for which the carrier in case of loss shall be answerable, whether through its negligence or otherwise.[89]

Contracts of this character furnish a just and reasonable mode of securing a due proportion between the amount for which the carrier becomes responsible and the freight which it receives, and of protecting itself against extortionate valuations in case of loss.[90] Such a contract is not in viola-

In Texas

(1) The rule of the text has been recognized and applied as the federal rule governing interstate shipments.—Henderson v. Wells Fargo & Co Express, Tex Civ.App, 217 S W. 962

(2) Where the jury found specially that the shipper of a grip through a hotel company as its agent represented that the grip was of the value of only ten dollars and that, if its true value of nearly five hundred dollars had been stated, the carrier would have exercised more care and the loss would probably have been prevented, it was not error to limit recovery against the carrier to fifty dollars, which was the extent of liability assumed by it, unless a greater value was declared and an additional rate paid—Galveston Hotel Co. v. Goggan, 253 S W. 694.

(3) Under the Texas statutes, however, as shown infra this section different rule applies as to intrastate shipments.

Live stock

(1) The carrier and the shipper may make an agreement as to the value of live stock shipped which will bind the shipper and control the amount of his recovery in case of loss—Bowring v. Wabash R Co, 77 Mo App. 250

(2) Interstate carrier of live animal may have alternate rates, one of which permits greater recovery for loss due to carrier's negligence—Grant v. American Ry. Express Co, 139 A. 784, 126 Me. 489.

tion of public policy;[91] on the contrary it is said that it would be unjust and unreasonable and repugnant to the soundest principle of fair dealing and of freedom in contracting, and thus in conflict with public policy, if the shipper should be allowed to reap the benefit of the contract if there is no loss, and to repudiate it in case of loss.[92] The shipper should not be permitted to impose on the carrier the obligations of a contract different from that into which it has entered,[93] and one reason for the rule sustaining the declared and agreed valuation is to prevent fraudulent practices by shippers in obtaining a lower rate by undervaluation.[94] Having accepted the lower rate dependent upon the specified valuation, the shipper is estopped to claim a greater value than that fixed.[95]

Extent and limits of rule in general. The fact that no express limitation against liability for negligence is contained in the contract does not in any way affect the operation of the general rule stated above; the limitation nevertheless applies to losses by reason of the carrier's negligence.[96] It has further been held that on principle it can make no difference whether the negligence is ordinary or gross,[97] although this proposition has been denied.[98] It has also been held that the shipper will not be relieved from the limitation by the fact that injury to the consignment was caused by the carrier's violation of a federal statute prohibiting the confinement of cattle in a car for more than twenty-eight hours.[99] So, as will be shown infra § 113 c, it has been held that the limitation applies, although the goods were stolen by the carrier's employees. On the other hand, the view has been taken, as stated infra § 115, that stipulations limiting the carrier's liability for loss or injury to an agreed valuation have no application in case of a conversion of the goods by the carrier. Whether the provision applies in case of loss or injury caused by delay, or by the carrier's delivery of the goods after notice of the shipper to stop them in transitu, which

The reason thus assigned in Corpus Juris has been approved by the Utah court in these terms. "It seems only fair that when the shipper declares that the goods he ships have a certain value he should not reap the benefit of the lower freight charge if there is no loss, and in case of loss recover a greater amount than the declared and agreed value. 10 C.J. p. 166, § 212. For a carrier to contract against loss through its negligence is against public policy, but it is not against good business morals nor against public policy to agree upon a valuation which shall limit the liability of the carrier, whether for loss arising from negligence or otherwise, when the contract is fair, open and reasonable, and no fraud or imposition of any kind has been practiced by the carrier."—Paradise Land & Live Stock Co. v. Gross, wanton, or wilful negligence. A limitation of liability to the declared value in an interstate contract of shipment applies to gross, wanton, and wilful negligence, making the theft or embezzlement of the shipment by an employee of the carrier easy of accomplishment and difficult of detection.—Henderson v. it agreed to do, or in case of negligence in the delivery of goods, is considered infra § 113 c, where the operation and effect of such provision generally is treated.

Arbitrary valuation. A very generally recognized limitation of the general rule above stated is that, if the purpose of the contract is merely to place an arbitrary valuation on the amount for which the carrier will be liable for loss or damage, and not to fix a reasonable valuation with reference to which the charges and the responsibilities of the carrier are to be proportioned, the contract is not just or reasonable and is not binding on the shipper. Such a contract, it is said, is nothing more than a cloak for a limitation of the carrier's liability against its own negligence, and is contrary to public policy.[1] It will not bind the shipper, although it is reduced to writing and signed by the shipper or assented to in writing,[2] and although a consideration consisting of a reduced freight rate is given.[3] Whether or not a contract belongs in this category depends on the facts of each case.[4]

Some courts draw a distinction between stipulations which merely fix the maximum value of property, limiting recovery in case of loss or injury, to a sum not exceeding such amount, and a stipulation by which the parties expressly agree to a certain fixed valuation. The latter stipulation, according to their view, is valid, while the former is void as a mere arbitrary attempt to limit the carrier's liability for loss or injury due to its negligence.[5] Other decisions repudiate this doctrine and hold that, on principle, there can be no difference between a case where the stipulation is that the value of the property does not exceed a specified sum and one by which the value is agreed to be a specified sum.[6] In either case, it is said, it becomes a part of the contract on which the minds of the parties meet and on which they act.[7]

In a number of decisions a distinction is made between contracts in which the valuation inserted in the contract is one designated by the shipper on request of the carrier, and contracts in which the valuation is inserted in the contract without being named by the shipper, or in other words a general limitation of actual value. According to some decisions the latter class of contracts is invalid.[8] This, however, is not the view of the United States supreme court or of some other courts in which the question has been raised; no difference in principle, it is held, exists between the two classes of contracts; when the latter class is acquiesced in by the shipper there is an "agreed" valuation as much as in the first class,[9] and the correctness of this view

Free transportation
"Where an interstate carrier issued a circular and published a general order providing that all shipments of hogs intended for exhibition at fairs and expositions should be carried thereto at the full tariff rates, but that, if returned in 30 days, they should be returned free from further freight charges, on presentation of the paid freight bill showing that the shipment moved over the carrier's lines on the first movement, and of a certificate from the proper officers of the fair, showing that the hogs had been regularly exhibited and had not changed ownership, and thereafter a hog was shipped to a fair on the carrier's line, for the purpose of exhibition, and the shipper complied in all respects with this order, and the carrier accepted the hog for return shipment in accordance with the agreement to return it free from further freight charges, and, while in course of transportation, the hog received injuries which caused its death, the shipper, if the injuries resulted from negligence of the carrier, was not bound by an arbitrary prearranged valuation upon such property, printed in a bill of lading issued to him, acknowledging receipt of the hog for return shipment free of additional freight charges, and he was entitled to recover full damages for the loss sustained by him by reason of such negligence."—De Bow v. is borne out by the weight of authority as to what constitutes a contract limiting liability, for, as shown supra § 91, where a limitation of liability is embodied in a receipt or bill of lading which is accepted by the shipper, he will in most jurisdictions be presumed to have acquiesced in such limitation, even without any formal assent thereto, in the absence of fraud or imposition.

Disproportion between actual and fixed value. In some jurisdictions the view has been taken that, where a contract limits the liability of the carrier to an agreed valuation, on a consideration of reduced charges for carriage of goods, and such agreed valuation is largely disproportionate to the value of the goods, it is violative of public policy, as far as it limits the carrier's liability for loss or injury caused by the negligence of itself or its servants, and that too, although the value of the goods shipped is not disclosed to the carrier.[10] On the other hand, it has been held that a mere difference between the value as agreed on and the actual value of the property, however wide such difference may be, is not a controlling test as to the validity of the stipulation, and that the true test is whether the stipulation was fairly entered into, by the parties, and is just and reasonable in the eye of the law; and contracts have frequently been sustained where the difference between the agreed and the fixed value was very great.[11] However, there are decisions, some of which were decided in jurisdictions where the foregoing view prevails, where contracts in which there was great discrepancy between the actual and the agreed value, taken in connection with other circumstances, have been held void as arbitrary and unreasonable. In some of these decisions the fact on which the reasonableness of the contract turns is the knowledge, or want of knowledge, on the part of the carrier of the value of the goods. If made knowing such value, and that the valuation fixed was unreasonably low, the contract is considered void as being an arbitrary limitation of liability;[12] but this view has been repudiated in other decisions where this precise question was carefully considered.[13] In other cases the decisions turned on the fact that the valuation was fixed without any reference to the charges and responsibilities to be borne by the carrier.[14] Other decisions seem to turn on the fact that the valuation was that expressed in the company's tariffs applicable to all shipments of a like character under a reduced rate, and that the valuation was not the result of any actual estimation or consideration of the actual value of the goods;[15] but these cases are not in harmony with decisions of the United States supreme court.[16] In a decision of the United States supreme court, in which the United States supreme court decisions were reviewed and relied on as the basis of its holding, it was declared "that the legality of the contract does not depend upon a valuation which shall have a relation to the actual worth of the property," but on the acceptance by the parties of the contract as the basis of shipment and on the force of the statute as to the filed tariff, making it optional with the shipper to ship at the lower rate and not avail himself of a greater recovery on paying the higher rate named in the tariff, and on the requirement of the shipper to take notice of its terms and to be bound thereby.[17]

Use of printed form

A case of an agreed valuation is presented where the shipper's agent filled out a printed bill of lading describing the shipment as "emigrant movables released to $10 per cwt," which was signed by the carrier's agent, and the goods were shipped under the lower rate applicable to goods of that character and value.—Great Northern R. Minority rule. In a few states the common-law rule is that, when loss or damage results from a violation of a contract of intra-state shipment, growing out of the negligence of the carrier or its servants, any limitation as to the amount recoverable for loss or injury contained in the contract of shipment is inoperative, although a reduced rate of freight is charged.[18] The decisions formulating this rule generally hold that contracts of this nature are in direct contravention of the common-law doctrine which forbids a common carrier to contract for exemption against the consequences of its own negligence or that of its servants,[19] and that there can be no difference in principle between contracts for total and contracts for partial exemption from liability.[20] It is recognized, however, that for losses caused otherwise than by the carrier's negligence, contracts fairly made on a reasonable consideration limiting the carrier's liability to an agreed valuation should be upheld.[21]

(2) Effect of Constitutional or Statutory Provisions

Statutes not prohibiting limitations of liability do not affect the general rule upholding limitations of liability as to value. Constitutional or statutory provisions, expressly forbidding any contractual limitation of the carrier's liability are applied usually to forbid contracts limiting liability to a specified valuation. Contracts limiting a carrier's liability for loss or injury to an agreed valuation are generally permitted by federal law if in compliance with the statutory requirements.

The general rule above stated in this section upholding limitations of liability as to value, is not affected by a statute which declares the measure of damages to be the market value at destination,[22] nor by a statute providing that no contract in any receipt shall "exempt" any common carrier from liability for loss;[23] and, under state statutes substantially identical with the Carmack Amendment to the Interstate Commerce Law, the effect of which is considered below, contracts limiting the liability of the carrier for loss or injury to goods shipped in intra-state commerce to an amount not greater than an agreed valuation are upheld and given effect according to their terms, even though the loss was due to the carrier's negligence.[24] A limitation of the shipper's recovery to the amount on which the freight charges are based is not regarded as an exemption of the carrier from liability for loss or injury which it has caused, within the statutory prohibition.[25] Where such a statute brings about a change in the law of the state, as where prior to its enactment the state adhered to the minority rule above announced in this section, the fact that the statute provides that nothing therein shall deprive the parties of any right or remedy under existing law does not preserve the common-law right of recovery of the actual value of the goods lost, where the bill of lading contained a clause limiting liability.[26]

Prohibiting limitation of common-law liability. While it has been held that state constitutional and statutory provisions which expressly forbid any limitation of the carrier's liability by special contract do not invalidate a clause in a shipping contract limiting the value of the goods covered in consideration of the rate given if a higher rate would be charged at a higher valuation,[27] in so far as intra-state shipments are concerned, under such provisions by the weight of authority contracts limiting liability in case of loss or injury to a specified valuation are held to constitute a limitation of the carrier's common-law liability and to be inoperative and void, and it makes no difference whether the loss or injury was caused by negligence or not.[28]

However, although prior to the Carmack amendment it was held that the fact that the contract was for the carriage of goods from a point in a state where statutes of this character obtain to a point in another state did not affect the operation of the rule,[29] as will be shown in the C.J.S. title Commerce § 92, also 10 C.J. p 174 note 35, by the construction placed by the supreme court of the United States on the Carmack amendment, contracts of interstate shipment of the character under consideration are now valid, notwithstanding statutory or constitutional provisions to the contrary. The power of the interstate commerce commission to fix nondiscriminatory rates in intra-state shipments does not include authority to bind a shipper to accept less than the actual value of goods lost in an intra-state shipment even if he signed a contract containing such limitation where the limitation is prohibited by statute, particularly where the agreed valuation is unreasonable.[30] It has been held, however, although there is authority to the contrary,[31] that notwithstanding such statute, if the shipper is guilty of any fraud or imposition on the carrier in reference to the nature or value of the articles shipped, whereby the carrier received a smaller compensation for the transportation and was induced not to take the care it would have taken if the value had been correctly stated, the carrier's liability is limited to the declared value.[32] Where the statute expressly makes invalid any contract for exemption from liability for loss occasioned by the carrier's neglect or misconduct, an attempted limitation to a stipulated sum is void where the loss is occasioned by the carrier's negligence or misconduct.[33]

Effect of federal legislation. In view of the rule, stated in the C.J.S. title Commerce § 92, also 12 C J. p 86 note 43, that the federal legislation supersedes absolutely all state laws and policies on the subject of interstate shipments,[34] since the adoption of the Carmack amendment, except during the period between the passage of the first and second Cummins amendments, where rates for interstate shipments have been graded according to the valuation of the property, contracts limiting the carrier's liability to the released value as set out in the contract have been upheld in all jurisdictions.[35] The Carmack Amendment does not prohibit, but authorizes, contracts limiting the liability of the carrier for loss or

Valuation held unreasonable

A valuation of each article of household goods shipped by carrier at ten cents per pound beyond which it attempts to limit its liability for loss of such goods is unreasonable and should not be enforced, since it is a matter of common knowledge that some articles of small weight are of great value, whereas others of greater weight are of small value—Lancaster v. Estoppel at common law against shipper to assert facts contrary to representation regarding value of intra-state shipment is ineffective, if resulting in enforcement contrary to statute of contract limiting carrier's liability, nor will the shipper's misrepresentation estop him from recovering actual value for loss or damage, where carrier in fact applies but one rate for particular property, for to apply an estoppel in such cases is to permit the carrier to limit its liability by contract.—Chesapeake & O Ry. First Cummins amendment

(1) Under the first Cummins amendment a contract attempting to limit the carrier's liability to a released value set out therein was void and of no effect.—Western Assur. Co. v. Wells Fargo & Co., 173 N W. 402, 143 Minn. 60.

(2) So, under the provision of that amendment making the carrier liable for loss of goods received for interstate shipment, unless they were hidden from view and the carrier was not notified as to their character, in which case it could limit its liability to a valuation amount which it could require shipper to state in writing, if the carrier was informed of the character of the concealed goods, it could not rely on a written statement of their value as a limitation of liability to that amount in case of loss or damage.—Thompson v Great Northern Ry. Co, 174 P. 607, 31 Idaho 492.

Notwithstanding second Cummins Act, an interstate carrier may, by agreement fairly and understandingly made, when shipper is given choice of lower rate based on declared or agreed value, limit liability to such value.—American Ry. injury to an amount not greater than a valuation fixed by an agreement of the parties, where fair, open, and reasonable, and made for the purpose of furnishing the basis of the liability assumed, and that too whether the loss or injury was due to the carrier's negligence or not,[36] although the act makes the carrier liable for some value.[37] The underlying principle of the amendment is that the carrier is entitled to base rates on value, and that its compensation should bear a reasonable relation to the risk and responsibility assumed, and its broad purpose is to compel establishment of reasonable rates, and to provide for their uniform application; special contracts are not permitted to give any advantage to a particular shipper.[38] Under the provision of the second Cummins Amendment permitting the carrier, by agreement in writing, to limit its liability to an agreed amount if authorized to base rates on value, to avoid liability for the full value the carrier must bring itself within the statute by obtaining, by order of the interstate commerce commission, the right to adopt alternative rates based on the declared valuation of the shipment,[39] and a written agreement from the shipper to a released value.[40] Under the provisions of this amendment, however, which prohibit limitations of liability for loss or damage to ordinary live stock, a limitation of recovery to a certain agreed amount per head for loss of any one such animal is void.[41] Animals chiefly valuable for breeding, racing, show purposes, or other special uses, being excluded by this act from the definition of "ordinary live stock," however, a limitation of liability with respect to a race horse is valid.[42]

Ordinary or gross negligence

Under Carmack Amendment, in interstate shipment of racing mare, shipper paying alternative rate based on one hundred fifty dollars valuation of mare, the valuation limited the amount the shipper could recover for damage to her for any defaults of carriers in transport, whether result of ordinary or gross negligence, as defined in law of state of suit and destination.—Bassett v Chicago & N. b. Value Not Disclosed or Stated

Ordinarily it is competent for the carrier to stipulate that it shall not be liable for goods beyond a certain named sum unless a value in excess thereof is disclosed.

It has already been suggested, supra § 78 b, that, where by fraudulent concealment of the shipper for the purpose of avoiding payment of increased charges for transportation the carrier is induced to accept goods under the belief that they are of ordinary character and value, while in fact they are of such exceptional character or value as that a higher rate would have been charged if the facts had been known, the transaction constitutes such a fraud as to relieve the carrier from liability for the exceptional value; and in accordance with this principle, while the rule is otherwise in some jurisdictions,[43] the weight of authority is that it is competent for the carrier by contract or notice brought to the attention of the shipper to stipulate that it shall not be liable for the goods beyond a certain named sum, unless the value in excess of that sum is disclosed to the carrier and an increased compensation paid in accordance with the increased value, and such a stipulation will be valid, even in case of loss by negligence,[44] it being reasonable and consistent with public policy.[45] Under such circumstances it is not the duty of the carrier to make inquiry as to the value, but it is the duty of the shipper to disclose the value if he seeks to hold the carrier liable beyond the stipulated sum.[46] The shipper by accepting a shipping receipt containing a recital that the carrier is not to be held liable beyond a designated sum, at not exceeding which sum the property is valued, unless a different valuation is stated, represents that the value does not exceed that sum.[47] However, it has been held that if it appears that the real value was known to the carrier to be in excess of the stipulated amount, then in case of negligence it will be liable for the real value, notwithstanding the stipulation.[48]

Basis for validity of contract

The validity of a carrier's limitation of liability for loss during transit is based on inclusion in contract of right of shipper to declare goods to be of higher agreed value, to which carrier will be bound on payment of higher rate of carriage in consideration of greater assumption of liability.—Faultless Clothing Co. v. Branch Storage Co., 300 N.Y. S. 642, 165 Misc. 658

Consistency with rate sheets

A limitation of the carrier's liability for an interstate shipment of live stock, where the shipper has made no declaration of value, to a primary valuation upon which the rate was based, is not repugnant to the declaration in the carrier's rate sheets on file with the interstate commerce commission that the rate schedules dealing with merchandise, which expressly provide that the primary limitations of value fixed shall be the measure of the charge and liability unless another and higher valuation be declared, must not be applied to live stock To hold otherwise would cause this clause to accomplish the result which it was obviously intended to prevent, that is, the control or modification of the charges contained in live-stock clauses by the provisions as to merchandise charges—American Exp Co v. U. S. Horseshoe Co, Pa., 37 S Ct. 595, 244 U.S. 58, 61 L.Ed. 990.

Value automatically fixed

"Where different rates for the shipment of property by the carriage company are prescribed by the carriers, under the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission and depending upon the declaration of the shipper of the value of the property to be shipped, and where a shipper offers property for shipment, and is quoted the lowest rate and ships thereunder without any formal declaration of value, held, that the agreement as to rate automatically fixed the value"—Chicago, R. tion of the Interstate Commerce Act making it an offense to obtain transportation of property at less than the established rate from a carrier subject to the act.[49] Furthermore, the general rule is not abrogated by, but is applicable under, the Carmack amendment[50] and the second Cummins amendment;[51] but under the first Cummins amendment a limitation of the amount of liability in a carrier's receipt for goods hidden from view was void where the carrier did not ask or require the shipper to state the character or value thereof, and the shipper gave no such information and did not dictate or suggest what the receipt should contain.[52] The view has been taken, however, that the shipper's acceptance of a receipt limiting the value constituted a sufficient statement in writing by him under that statute so as to make the limitation binding.[53]

c. Invoice Price, or Value at Place of Shipment

Contractual provisions limiting the carrier's liability for loss to the invoice price or value at the time and place of shipment are upheld in the absence of statutes changing the rule.

A regulation that the liability of the carrier in case of loss shall be limited to the invoice value of the goods is a reasonable regulation as to the damage to be recovered and is valid.[54] So a provision that the liability for loss shall be measured by the value at the time and the place of shipment is generally upheld,[55] except where a controlling statute prevents the application of this rule[56] or where it is impossible to separate such provision from one which is invalid.[57] It is not important that the agreement does not specify the value but leaves it to be ascertained, limiting it to a particular time and place, since the same principle would manifestly apply as though the parties had stated the exact value.[58] There is nothing contrary to public policy in contracts of this character;[59] they are intended merely to establish a rule for determining the value of the property in case of loss, and not to limit or diminish the carrier's liability,[60] and although where the actual loss was more than the amount recoverable thereunder such a limitation was contrary to the first Cummins amendment which, as stated supra § 97 b, prohibited limitations of liability in interstate shipments,[61] nothing in the Carmack amendment or other statutes such as the second Cummins amendment relating to interstate commerce forbids limitations of this character.[62] On the contrary, a contract for an interstate shipment under a statute which provides that no contract, receipt, rule, notice, or regulation shall exempt any railway company from the liability of a common carrier which would exist had no contract, receipt, rule, notice, or regulation been made or entered into—Marshall Land & Mercantile Co v Missouri Pac. R. Co, Mo App., 270 S W. 422.

Exemption from common-law liability

A provision in a bill of lading limiting liability to the value at the point of shipment is unenforceable

"This court in Gratiot St. Warehouse Co. v. Missouri, K. & T Ry Co, 102 S.W. 11, 124 Mo App. 545, held that it was competent for a carrier to contract that the loss shall be measured by the standard of cost and value at the time and place of shipment, although the general rule is that the shipper can recover the market value of the goods at the point of destination. The Kansas City Court of Appeals, in Wilson v Chicago Great Western R Co., 190 S W. 22, held likewise, and based such opinion upon the authority of Gratiot St Warehouse Co. v. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co, supra, by this court. The opinion in Gratiot St. Warehouse Co v. Missouri, K. & T. Ry Co, supra, by this court, was handed down in 1907; and in 1911 the Legislature enacted what is now section 10018, R S 1919, which provides that no contract, receipt, rule, notice, or regulation shall exempt any railway company or common carrier from the liability of a common carrier which would exist had no contract, receipt, rule, notice, or regulation been made or entered into. First Cummins amendment

(1) "There is the following stipulation in the bill of lading in the instant case, namely: 'The amount of any loss or damage for which any carrier is liable shall be computed on the basis of the value of the property at the place and time of shipment under this bill of lading, including the freight charges, if paid.' This value has been construed by the courts to mean the invoice price at which the goods are sold at the time and place of shipment, with freight added to the place of destination, if paid. Kelly v. Southern Railway, 66 S E 198, 84 S C. 249, 137 Am St. Rep. 842. While such stipulation might not be valid under the Cummins Amendment of 1915 (Fed.Stat Ann.1916, Supp. pp 124, 125 [U.S Comp St. §§ 8592, 8604a]) as against the shipper where there has been no such sale, or where such sale is defeated by the action of the carrier, and it appears in evidence that the stipulated value is less than the market value at destination at the time the goods should have there arrived, and the shipper seeks to recover such market value, no such case is presented by the record before us And such stipulation, with the construction placed upon it aforesaid, is certainly valid under the circumstances of the instant case, for in such case, in the absence of any stipulation on the subject, the law would fix the same measure of damages"—New York, P & N R Co v. Chandler, 106 S.E. 684, 692, 129 Va 695

(2) A provision, in a bill of lading on a shipment originating prior to the first Cummins amendment, that damages for loss would be computed on the bona fide invoice price to consignee at the time and place of shipment, was valid and binding on the carrier—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. v Texas Packing Co., Tex. Civ.App., 253 S.W. 864.

made in a state where such a limitation of liability is forbidden by statute is valid notwithstanding it contains such a limitation, inasmuch as the Carmack amendment supersedes all state legislation on the subject.[63] The Cummins amendments were not intended to apply to shipments to nonadjacent foreign countries, and hence nothing in such acts prohibits provisions of the character here under consideration in contracts for such shipments.[64] Moreover, a state statute providing that common carriers in case of loss or injury shall be liable for the value of the goods at the place of destination does not prohibit contracts in derogation of the statutory rule.[65]

According to some decisions a stipulation of the character under consideration is thought not to be good if so worded as to deny to the shipper any recovery in case of loss for freight paid in addition to the value of the goods,[66] but, as shown infra § 112 b, a limitation of liability as to value at the place of shipment should be construed to mean the value when delivered to the carrier, under contract of transportation, which would reasonably include freight paid either by the shipper or the consignee, since property under such circumstances at the place of shipment would reasonably be worth the invoice price with freight added. It has been held that such a limitation is void as against public policy in case of loss caused by negligence, on the principle that the effect of the stipulation is not alone to avoid inconvenience and uncertainty in the demand for damages, but to work a reduction in the real loss,[67] although there is authority supported by the majority rule above stated applicable to limitations of liability generally in respect of value, which sustains the opposite view, on the principle that the stipulation is not a limitation of the carrier's liability for negligence.[68] Whether limitations of this kind apply to damages occurring from failure to deliver within a reasonable time is considered infra § 113 c; and their application where the carrier wrongfully sells or converts the goods infra § 115.

§ 103. Limitations of Liability in Respect of Time and Place of Delivery

A carrier may contract against liability for loss resulting from delay not due to its negligence or from leaving goods at a station at which there is no agent.

Although it has been said that a carrier's statutory duty to transport within a reasonable time cannot be varied by contract,[69] it is generally held permissible for the carrier to contract against liability for loss or injury resulting from delay in transportation, where the delay is not due to the negligence of the carrier or its servants,[70] as by contracting for

63. Tex.—Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Carmack, Civ.App., 176 S.W. 158

"In 10 Corpus Juris, 57, it is said: 'Before the enactment of the Carmack Amendment the greatest confusion existed as to whether a limitation of the carrier's liability for loss or injury to a specified value was valid in case the shipment was lost or injured by reason of the negligence of the carrier. . . . The effect of the Carmack Amendment is, of course, to make the rule uniform in all jurisdictions of the United States, so far as interstate shipments are concerned, and to render valid a limitation of the character under consideration, whether the loss or injury was due to the carrier's negligence or not.' Furthermore, it is said that even in states where such a contract is held void under statutes prohibiting carriers from limiting their common-law liability, 'a contract for an interstate shipment, made in a state where such a statute is in force, is valid under the Carmack Amendment, inasmuch as the decisions of the federal courts prior to the amendment held such contracts valid.' Our own Supreme Court has also directly upheld the validity of such agreement"—Crenshaw Bros. & Saffold v. Southern Pac. Foreign shipment

The intention as to destination with which goods are delivered and accepted for conveyance by a carrier being the determining factor in deciding whether a consignment should be classified as foreign or interstate commerce, where a bill of lading described a consignment of grain as being for export, and, from an agreed statement of facts, it appeared that each carload, at the time it was shipped and at the time it was destroyed in transit, was intended for transportation by railroad to Baltimore, where it was to be unloaded into the carrier's elevators and thereafter loaded into a vessel for transportation to a point in Europe, the shipments were in the course of transportation to a nonadjacent foreign country at the time of their destruction, so that a stipulation in the bills of lading, limiting the carrier's liability to the value of the grain at the time and place of shipment, was not contrary to the provision of the Federal Act to Regulate Commerce and its amendments, Comp.St. § 8604a, prohibiting stipulations against recovery of less than the full amount of the actual loss or damage to property in transit from one state to another, or for export to an adjacent foreign country, nor did the purchase of such bills of lading by plaintiffs while the grain was in transit, although it affected the title thereto, make any change in its movement or destination or in any of its commercial characteristics.—Fahey v. exemption from liability for loss from a specified cause,[71] and although the contrary rule prevailed under the first Cummins Amendment,[72] the right of the carrier to limit its liability in this regard is not affected by the Carmack or the second Cummins Amendment.[73] However, in accordance with the general principles already stated supra § 99, a carrier cannot in any event limit its liability for delay resulting from its own negligence or the negligence of its agents or servants,[74] and this rule also applies under the Carmack and Cummins Amendments as well as at common law.[75] It is especially applicable where there is a legislative declaration as to when a common carrier shall be liable for delay; this liability cannot be abridged by special contract.[76] So, a contract limiting liability for delay is inoperative where the shipper is induced to enter into such contract by the false representations of the carrier's agent.[77]

A carrier may stipulate in its bill of lading that property destined to, or taken from, a station, wharf, or landing at which there is no regularly appointed agent shall be entirely at the owner's risk after it is unloaded from, or until it is loaded in, cars or vessels, and that when received from, or delivered on, private or other sidings or wharves it shall be at the owner's risk until the cars are attached to, and after they are detached from, trains.[78] Such a stipulation, as shown infra § 112 b, does not undertake to limit the carrier's liability resulting from its own negligence or the negligence of its agents and servants, and it is a reasonable restriction of the carrier's liability.[79] Moreover, the view has been taken that the stipulation does not limit the carrier's liability as a common carrier, but so far as it relates to the carrier's receipt of the goods merely defines the circumstances under which delivery for shipment and acceptance by the carrier shall be understood as having taken place between the parties, and hence is not a violation of the first Cummins Amendment.[80]

§ 104. Limitation or Release of Damages Occurring Prior to Execution of Contract

A contract releasing or limiting liability for damages already accrued without any new consideration is invalid.

Although such an agreement has been held valid if supported by a valuable consideration,[81] a contract releasing or limiting the liability of a carrier for damages already accrued, without any new consideration therefor, is void;[82] and, as stated infra

"The common carrier, of course, is liable in any case for damages resulting from its own negligence, but he may by contract protect himself from the hardship and injustice of a rule of law which requires him to make delivery safely and expeditiously of goods accepted for transportation, whether or not it is possible to do so by the use of all diligence and every agency available to him."—American Ry. Shopmen's strike

If, due to shopmen's strike and without carrier's negligence, it had reason to believe there would be delay in transporting live stock, carrier had right to protect against such contingency by contract, since it could have refused to accept shipment for failure to comply with a reasonable requirement in relation thereto, provided strike could be considered as cause for unavoidable delay.—Warner v. § 112 b, stipulations in a contract releasing or limiting liability will not ordinarily be construed to exempt the carrier from damages which have accrued to the shipment before the contract was entered into. It is unreasonable to require a shipper to release the carrier from a liability already accrued on account of negligence or failure to perform a duty owing to shippers,[83] and while it has been said that a separate consideration is necessary to render a contract of this character valid,[84] the view has been taken that it would be violative of the policy declared by the federal statute regulating interstate commerce to permit a carrier to violate its duty and to contract against liability therefor no matter for what consideration.[85] Furthermore, it has been held that a contract of this character, in so far as interstate shipments are concerned, involved a discrimination in contravention of the Elkins Act and was void.[86]

§ 105. Limiting Liability to That of Warehouseman or Forwarder

A carrier may by contract limit its liability to that of warehouseman after the arrival of the goods at destination if they are not removed within a reasonable time, but cannot change its liability to that of forwarder only.

It has been held that it is competent for the carrier to stipulate in the shipping contract that it will be liable for goods only as warehouseman after their arrival at destination if not removed within a specified time after notice,[87] and in case of failure to remove within the specified time the carrier, in conformity with the rules, stated infra § 157, relating to the nature and extent of the carrier's liability as a warehouseman, is liable only for negligence.[88] On the other hand, it has been held that such a provision does not change the established rule that, where the goods are not accepted, the liability of the carrier as carrier under the Carmack and first Cummins amendments does not cease until the expiration of a reasonable time for the removal of the goods after the giving of the notice to the party entitled to receive them.[89] A provision for terminating the carrier's liability as such immediately on the arrival of the shipment at its destination is subject to the requirement which the law, from public reason of any prior verbal contract, such release did not affect the cause of action on the oral contract, that being a different contract on which a right of action had already accrued—Thee v. Wabash Ry. Co., 233 S.W. 959, 208 Mo.App. 200—10 C.J. p 179 note 82 [a].

Delay in furnishing cars

An interstate shipper did not waive right to damages for delay in furnishing stock cars by a provision in the subsequent bill of lading that all prior contracts relating to the manner of receipt or transportation of the live stock described herein, or furnishing cars therefor, are hereby waived and merged in this agreement, it not being within the power of the carrier under the Carmack Amendment to make a contract exempting it from liability for damages resulting from its own negligence or unlawful act in the handling of interstate business—Howell v. Cases distinguished

"It is argued that this identical provision in a bill of lading was held valid and binding in the case of Southern Ry. Co. v. Prescott, S.C., 36 S.Ct. 469, 240 U.S. 632, 60 L.Ed. 836, and that therefore it should be held by us as fixing the character of the liability of the terminal carrier in this case as that of a warehouseman after the expiration of 48 hours after both Chandler and De Wald were notified of the arrival of the goods at destination. And the discussion by the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the Matter of Bills of Lading, decided April 14, 1919, 52 Interst. Com. Com'n R. 671, at pages 696, 700, 701, and 712, is also relied upon. But neither the Supreme Court decision nor the discussion of the Interstate Commerce Commission referred to sustains the position that the clause in the bill of lading in question is applicable or binding in cases of interstate shipments, when the relationship of shipper and carrier has not been terminated by the expiration of a reasonable time for the removal of the goods after the giving of the notice to the party entitled to receive them. In the Prescott Case it developed in evidence on the trial that the consignee accepted the goods, took away a portion of them, and left the residue merely for his convenience until he could call for them, and, as stated in the opinion of the court: 'At the close of the testimony the plaintiff withdrew his causes of action against the defendant as a common carrier . . . and the case went to the jury solely with respect to the liability of the defendant as warehouseman.' The loss in the case was occasioned by fire while the goods remained in the custody of the railroad company in the admitted capacity of warehouseman. And, as clearly appears from the opinion of the court in the Prescott Case, and from what is said with respect to that case and other cases by the Interstate Commerce Commission in its report in the Matter of Bills of Lading, 52 Interst. Com. Com'n. R. at pages 696 to 700, inclusive (referred to at page 712), the Prescott Case has not changed the established rule that when the goods are not accepted, the liability of the carrier, as carrier, under the Carmack Amendment, does not cease until the expiration of a reasonable time for the removal of the goods after the giving of the notice to the party entitled to receive them. And the Interstate Commerce Commission in its said report unquestionably recognizes that such rule was in force as late as April 14, 1919, unaffected by the clause in bills of lading which is drawn in question in the case before us, notwithstanding the Prescott Case, which is expressly referred to and discussed in such report."—New York, P. & N. R. Co. v. Chandler, 106 S.E. 684, 693, 129 Va. 695.

policy, injects into the agreement, that the responsibility of the common carrier, as such, shall continue until a reasonable time and opportunity has been allowed the consignee for receiving the goods.[90] There are decisions, however, even in jurisdictions where liability of the carrier as such continues until there has been a reasonable time for removal of the property, which hold that the carrier may stipulate that its liability as such shall terminate and its liability as warehouseman begin on the arrival of the property at its destination, provided there is a consideration for the contract.[91] So, it has been held that a common carrier may contract that it will not be liable, except as warehouseman, while the property awaits further conveyance by a connecting carrier,[92] and that an express company may limit its liability for packages received to be shipped C. O. D to that of warehouseman while holding the packages for collection.[93]

A common carrier cannot divest itself of its obligation as such and by stipulation in a contract of shipment change its liability to that of a forwarder only.[94] Where the law has affixed to a company the status of common carrier, this status is not affected by an agreement of the parties that they are not carriers but only forwarders.[95] A clause in a receipt given by a forwarding company, "Claim for any loss or damage must be presented within thirty (30) days from date of arrival of shipment at destination," etc, referred to claims for loss or damage while the goods were in transit due to some fault of the railroad company, and was not intended to cover a claim for damages due to the forwarder's failing to withhold the goods from shipment on the shipper's order.[96]

§ 106. Exempting Carrier from Liability as Warehouseman

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases. See also supra § 105, and infra §§ 156, 157.

§ 107. Limitation of Liability for Injuries to Perishable Goods by Heat

A carrier may limit its liability for damages caused by heat.

A contract exempting the carrier from liability for damages to perishable goods caused by heat is not unreasonable nor against public policy and will protect the carrier from liability for loss so caused, provided the carrier is itself free from negligence.[97] That such a contract will not be construed so as to protect the carrier from the consequences of its own negligence is shown infra § 112 b.

§ 108. Limiting Liability for Goods Not Sealed and Marked, or Not Packed According to Requirements

Unless prohibited by statute a carrier can relieve itself from liability for loss of goods not sealed and marked or not packed according to regulations.

While such a provision is permissible in the absence of a prohibitory statute,[98] a stipulation in a receipt relieving a carrier from liability for loss of money, jewelry, etc, unless separately packed, sealed, and marked as such, and so described, is an attempt to limit the common-law liability of the carrier and in contravention of a statute forbidding common carriers to limit their common-law liability by inserting exceptions in the bill of lading or memorandum given on receipt of the goods for transportation, or in any manner whatever, and declaring void any stipulation made in contravention of such statute.[99]

§ 109. Requiring Shipper to Insure

The carrier cannot require the shipper to insure the goods carried.

A method sometimes resorted to for the purpose of avoiding liability for negligence is that of requiring the shipper to take insurance on the property as against loss. It is true, as shown infra § 399, that a contract of insurance taken by the carrier on goods in its custody and a stipulation in the bill of lading by which the carrier shall have the benefit of any insurance held by the shipper are valid. To require as a condition of acceptance of the goods that the shipper shall insure them against all loss, however, is to throw the burden of liability for the carrier's negligence on the shipper, and such a contract is invalid;[1] but it has been held, in a case governed by the law of England, that a clause exempting the carrier from liability for any damage capable of being covered by insurance is valid.[2]

§ 110. Limitations Placing Burden of Proving Negligence on Shipper

Authorities differ as to whether the parties may by contract stipulate that the burden of proving negligence shall rest on the shipper.

According to some decisions, while a carrier cannot contract against its own negligence, it may by special contract place the burden of proving negligence on its part on the shipper,[3] but there is authority to the contrary,[4] it being held that such a provision is, in practical effect, an effort by the carrier to exempt itself from liability for its negligence, thus working an injustice to the shipper that the Interstate Commerce Act and its amendments never contemplated.[5] So, it has been held that a stipulation against the presumption of negligence which would arise from proof of certain facts and prescribing the character of proof necessary to fix liability for loss of the goods on the carrier is unreasonable as an abrogation of the rules of evidence, and will not be enforced;[6] and that a stipulation in regard to the amount of proof required in order to fix the carrier's liability is invalid.[7] As to the burden of proving negligence generally see infra § 254.

§ 111. Limiting Liability for Mental Anguish

Under the Carmack amendment a carrier cannot limit its liability for special damages for mental anguish caused by delay in delivery.

While it is settled, as stated supra § 97 b, that the Carmack amendment does not prohibit the carrier from limiting its liability for loss or damage to the property shipped, a carrier cannot thereunder limit its liability for special damages by reason of mental anguish sustained by plaintiff as a result of the carrier's delay in delivery.[8]

§ 112. Construction of Contracts Limiting Liability

a. General rules of construction
b. Special applications of rules

a. General Rules of Construction

Contracts limiting liability are construed most strongly against the carrier; and other general rules of construction are applicable.

While stipulations for limited liability ought not to be wholly frittered away by an adherence to the letter of the contract in obvious disregard of its intent and spirit,[9] in construing an agreement relied on as limiting the carrier's liability, words and phrases which are susceptible of different meanings will be construed most strongly against the carrier and in favor of the shipper, the reason being that restrictions of the carrier's liability in contracts such as receipts or bills of lading, drawn up and executed by it, are for its benefit and are interposed for the purpose of escaping a liability which would otherwise be imposed by law.[10] Accordingly, where there are two inconsistent provisions in a contract,

Interstate shipment from Nebraska
Shipper suing truck carrier for loss of cargo en route to New York from Nebraska could not claim that oral agreement requiring shipper to procure insurance and limiting carrier's liability was void under Nebraska statutes, since alleged attempt of statutes to limit liability in shipment would be direct burden on interstate commerce and would be invalid in so far as shipment involved was affected.—Nebraska Co-op. the law will favor that which tends the least to diminish the carrier's common-law liability,[11] and a specific clause imposing common-law liability on the carrier for loss of certain goods from particular causes takes effect to the exclusion of general clauses containing matters of general exemption.[12]

The rule of ejusdem generis applies, so that where the contract stipulates against liability for losses resulting from certain specified causes and this specification is followed by more general words of exemption, the latter are to be construed as embracing only such causes as are ejusdem generis with those specifically named, where the contrary is not made clearly to appear.[13]

A provision in one of two contracts of shipment signed by the shipper to the effect that any question arising under it shall be determined by the law of a certain state does not govern in the construction of the other contract.[14]

Operation and effect of contracts see infra § 113.

b. Special Applications of Rules

General rules of construction have been applied to particular limitations, as well as to many words and phrases contained therein. Such limitations will not be construed to protect the carrier from its own negligence; nor, in general, will they be construed to release liability for damages that accrued before the contract of carriage was entered into.

The general rules of construction here under consideration have been applied in a great variety of cases involving a construction and application of particular specifications of losses for which the carrier was not to be held liable, such as cases where the stipulation was for exemption from liability for losses due to accidents to machinery,[15] climatic conditions,[16] delay in transportation,[17] leakage and

(1) A carrier is liable for loss or injury not occasioned by or due to some act or fault of the owner, or to a cause inherent in the animal shipped, regardless of provision of contract that it should not be liable for the conduct or acts of the animals to themselves, or each other, such as kicking, or smothering, or damage from condition of the animals themselves—Alexander v. American Ry. Express Co., 193 N.W. 560, 195 Iowa 1155.

(2) A provision in a contract for the shipment of stock exempting the carrier from liability for loss resulting from the acts or nature of the animals or from any cause whatever except the negligence of the carrier and its employees was not intended as a blanket release from loss from any cause whatever—Ruebel Bros. v. 17. Causes beyond carrier's control

A contract providing for carriers' nonliability for injury to stock "for delay caused by stress of weather, by obstruction of tracks, by riots, strikes, or stoppage of labor or from causes beyond their control," did not include an injury resulting from the derailing of cars, the latter phrase referring only to the word "delay."—Slider v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 161 N.W. 961, 194 Mich. 581.

Delay not due to negligence

Under stipulation in bill of lading providing that, except in cases of negligence approximately contributing thereto, no carrier in possession of any live stock should be liable for any delay caused by strikes, etc., carrier had right to show that delay to intrastate shipment of live stock was not caused by its negligence.—Warner v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., 274 S.W. 90, 218 Mo. App. 314.

Delay of live stock

Although a provision in a contract for the shipment of live stock, to the effect that, in the event of any unusual delay owing to the carrier's negligence, the shipper shall accept as full compensation the amount expended in the purchase of food and water, has, as shown infra § 113 b, been held invalid as a contract exempting the carrier from liability for negligence, it has also been held that such a provision does not prevent recovery in a case where the shipper during the period of delay was unable to obtain food and water, and in consequence of the delay some of the cattle died, but only contemplates a case where the shipper can feed and water the cattle during the delay, and thereby save them, and does so—Galloway v. Erie R. Co., 102 N.Y.S. 25, 116 App. Div. 777, affirmed 84 N.E. 1113, 192 N.Y. 545.

breakage,[18] fire,[19] floods or fire,[20] unavoidable dangers and accidents,[21] robbery,[22] strikes,[23] "or in any way."[24] So, limitations of liability as dependent on the time or place of loss have been construed and applied.[25] Where a shipper of freight under a limited liability contract makes a new contract divert-

Duty to re-ice shipment

A stipulation exempting a carrier from liability for delay in transportation does not relieve it in case of delay from an obligation assumed by the carrier to re-ice the shipment adequately from the point of shipment to destination—Geraty v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 62 S.E. 444, 81 S. C. 367.

Existing strike

A clause in a shipping contract, exempting carrier from liability on account of strikes, carries on its face notice to shipper that carrier would not be liable for delays in furnishing cars caused by a strike which had been in effect three months preceding the time of making the contract, and exempting clause did not limit liability for delays in furnishing cars which might have occurred in the future.—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co. v. Watts, 271 S.W. 464, 168 Ark. 804.

"Outlaw" strikes

Contract limiting interstate carrier's liability for delays in transportation due to "strikes," includes all strikes whether called "outlaw" or strikes not called officially by the organization or labor union of which the strikers are members, or regularly called and organized strikes if it is so general, and affects the facilities of the carrier so as to render impossible prompt and safe delivery.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Johnson, 100 So. 743, 87 Fla. 451.

Stations without regular agent

(1) Under a provision in a bill of lading, that property destined to, or taken from, a station, wharf, or landing at which there is no regularly appointed agent shall be entirely at risk of owner after unloaded from cars or vessels or until loaded into cars or vessels, and when received from, or delivered on, private or other sidings, wharves, or landings, shall be at owner's risk until the cars are attached to, and after they are detached from, trains, neither clause has application, except in cases where it appears the loss of goods shipped occurred at stations, wharves, or landings at which the carrier did not maintain a regularly appointed agent—McClure v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 98 S.E. 514, 83 W.Va. 473—10 C.J. p. 186 note 67 [f].

(2) Thus, a bill of lading containing the provision under consideration did not exempt carrier from liability for loss of freight by fire while the loaded cars were on a private siding on carrier's belt line about three-quarters of a mile from a station at which an agent was maintained—McClure v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., supra.

(3) So, where the shipper without compensation discharged the agent's duties at the station, the clause was held inapplicable—W. H. & C. B. Hodges v. Louisiana Ry. & Nav. Co., 156 So. 26, 180 La. 3.

(4) A clause in a through bill of lading, providing that goods "destined to or taken from a station wharf or landing, at which there is no regularly appointed agent," should be held at owner's risk while in the yard after arrival, did not apply to city yards at which the company had a station—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co. v. Solomon & Wineberg, 256 S.W. 862, 161 Ark. 552.

(5) Where goods had been loaded in a railroad car on the shipper's private siding, issuance of the bill of lading by the carrier for immediate shipment constituted a delivery of the goods to the carrier, but was not sufficient to make the car part of a train within the provision of the bill of lading imposing liability only after the car had been attached to a train—Atlantic Refining Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 113 A. 570, 270 Pa. 415

"Private or other sidings"

Under a bill of lading providing that property, when received from, or delivered on, "private or other sidings," should be at owner's risk until the cars were attached to, and after they were detached from, trains, an additional track on the carrier's right of way, parallel with and connected with its main track by two switches, and closed at each end by a bumper, used for the storage of cars and for making up trains, and for the convenience of warehouses fronting thereon, was a "siding," and, although not a private siding, was within the term "other sidings," as that term was used to make conditions comprehensive, so as to apply to all sidings whether public or private—Bers v. Erie R. Co., 163 N.Y.S. 114, 176 App.Div. 241.

"On or about" leased premises

Cars delivered on tracks alongside dock space leased by shipper were not "on or about" leased premises, within clause in lease, so as to exempt carrier from liability for loss by fire.—Pillsbury Flour Mills Co. v. Erie R. Co., 216 N.Y.S. 486, 127 Misc. 466, affirmed 222 N.Y.S. 882, 230 App.Div. 826, affirmed 162 N.E. 560, 248 N.Y. 649, certiorari denied Erie R. Co. v. Pillsbury Flour Mills Co., 49 S.Ct. 80, 278 U.S. 645, 73 L.Ed. 559.

Notice of arrival

(1) Where a bill of lading provides "for loss, damage, or delay, caused by fire occurring after 48 hours (exclusive of legal holidays) after notice of arrival of the property at destination has been duly sent or given, the carrier's liability shall be that of warehouseman only," the 48 hours does not begin until the consignee receives the notice, and a request of the carrier by a consignee to mail to him the notice of the arrival of goods provided for does not make the postal department the consignee's agent for the receipt of the notice—Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Shaw, 90 So. 629, 125 Miss. 9

(2) It has been held, however, that within the provision of a bill of lading limiting liability to that of a warehouseman after a notice of arrival had been duly sent or given, the expression "duly sent" means sent in a regular and approved manner, so that it is sufficient if notice by a letter stamped and addressed is deposited in the post office, although it was not received. A bill of lading requiring notice of arrival of the goods to be duly sent or given

ing the shipment while the goods are in transit awaiting the shipment, the second contract is ancillary to the first and does not affect the limited liability therein provided.[26]

Particular words and phrases in bills of lading or shipping contracts have received judicial construction, such as "all baggage,"[27] "at the convenience of the company,"[28] "carriages,"[29] "contents and value unknown,"[30] "each horse, mule, etc.,"[31] "go through uncompressed . . . unless compressed . . . in transit at carrier's discretion,"[32] "other animals,"[33] "owner's risk,"[34] "package,"[35] "perishable property,"[36] "weight, contents, packing, marks, and damage,"[37] and "willful misconduct or actual negligence."[38]

Operation and effect of contracts generally see infra § 113.

Limitations as to value of shipment. The rule of strict construction of contracts limiting liability, stated supra this section subdivision a, is applied to contracts containing limitations as to the value of the shipment,[39] but the circumstances and condidoes not make actual notice necessary, since the words "or given" are qualified by the words "duly sent," and proof of either the due sending of the notice or actual notice is sufficient.—Peavey v. Philadelphia, B & W. R. Co, 277 F. 333, 51 App D C. 127.

(3) Under a bill of lading limiting liability of carrier to that of warehouseman for loss occurring forty-eight hours after notice of arrival and also providing, in another clause, for storage of goods, which, within forty-eight hours after notice of arrival, are not removed by the party "entitled to receive" them, the notice of arrival is to be given to the party "entitled to receive" the goods, which means a party who has an interest in the goods distinct from that of another or forwarding carrier, a steamship company, accepting them for conveyance to their destination, not being such a party in the absence of a showing of its authority to act for the owner in the transaction — Baltimore & O. Words on face of bill of lading

Where, according to the tariff schedules, a shipper or owner of cotton is not entitled to select the place at which his cotton is to be compressed, the fact that he wrote on the bill of lading that it was to be compressed at a certain place will not relieve the carrier from liability for its loss, under a clause of the bill of lading relieving the carrier from liability for loss of the property while it is stopped and held in transit on the request of the shipper or owner —D'Utassy v. The phrase, "owner's risk," as used in the phrase, "Shipper's load and count . . . owner's risk," stamped on a bill of lading for a sealed carload shipment, applies to the shipper's load and count and is intended merely to relieve the carrier of liability for the contents of the car as disclosed on the bill and not to make a special contract whereby the carrier is exempted from all liability except for its negligence, which would contravene the first Cummins amendment applicable to the shipment.— Lehigh Valley R Co. v. Ambiguous provisions

(1) A receipt for a C O. D shipment stated: "Please Rush. Uniform Express Receipt. The company will not pay over $50 in case of loss or 50 cents per pound, actual weight, for any shipment in excess of 100 pounds, unless a greater value is declared and charges for such greater value paid. Adam Express Co Nonnegotiable Receipt 10-6-1917 Received from Dept of Agriculture, subject to the Classifications and Tariffs in effect on the date hereof, 1 box hog cholera serum. Value herein declared by shipper to be C O. D. fifty-six and 75/100 dollars Consigned to W P. Allen, at Wheeler, Va. Which the company agrees to carry upon the terms and conditions printed on the back hereof, to which the shipper agrees and as evidence thereof accepts and signs this receipt. . . . Note— . . . If the shipper desires to release the value to $50 00 for any shipment of 100 pounds or less, or not exceeding fifty cents per pound actual weight for any shipment in excess of 100 pounds, the value may be released by inserting 'not exceeding $50' or 'not exceeding fifty cents per pound,' in which case the company's liability is limited to an amount not exceeding the value so declared or released." On the back of the receipt was the following material provision: "2. In consideration of the rate charged for carrying said property, which is dependent upon the value thereof and is based upon an agreed valuation of not exceeding fifty dollars for any shipment of 100 pounds or less, and not exceeding fifty cents per pound, actual weight, for any shipment in excess of 100 pounds, unless a greater value is declared at the time of shipment, the shipper agrees that the company shall not be liable in any event for more than fifty dollars for any shipment of 100 pounds or less, or for more than fifty cents per pound, actual weight, for any shipment weighing more than 100 pounds, unless a greater value is stated herein Unless a greater value is declared and stated herein the shipper agrees that the value of

tions of each particular case must be regarded in the interpretation of such a contract.[40] A notation on a C. O. D. shipment of the amount to be collected by the carrier, not entered in a space left blank for a declaration of value, is not a declaration of value limiting the carrier's liability;[41] and a clause limiting the liability of the carrier to a stipulated agreed value, "on which basis the rate of freight is adjusted," clearly means that a choice of rates was given to the shipper, and that the rate was tied to the release, a lesser rate being charged by virtue of the limiting clause.[42] A limitation of liability as to value at the place of shipment should be construed to mean the value when delivered to the carrier, under contract of transportation, which would reasonably include freight paid either by the shipper or the consignee, since property under such circumstances at the place of shipment would reasonably be worth the invoice price with the freight added.[43] A charge for carting paid by the shipper from the place where he purchased the goods to defendant's freight station is not part of the value within such provision;[44] the words, "place of shipment," mean the city, town, or locality where the shipment originates as contradistinguished from the place of destination, and cannot be construed to mean the actual street or station from which the goods are shipped.[45] Matters relating to the operation and effect of contractual limitations as to the value of the shipment are considered infra § 113 c. Whether or not a contract containing a limitation of liability as to value is one relieving the carrier from the consequences of its own negligence is a question on which the courts are divided, the conflicting views are discussed supra § 102.

Construction limiting liability for negligence not favored In harmony with the rules stated supra § 99 and infra § 113 b, a contract containing valid limitations of the carrier's common-law liability will not be construed so as to protect the carrier from the consequences of its own negligence, or that of its agents or servants,[46] and no arrangement, understanding, agreement, or scheme between the shipper and carrier will be given the effect of relieving the carrier from the consequences of its negligence, since the carrier cannot accomplish by indirection what it cannot directly accomplish by contract.[47]

Applying this rule it has been held that the carrier cannot require the shipper to inspect its own equipment and assume the risks of defect therein.[48] So, a stipulation that the goods are accepted by the carrier at the owner's risk is not to be construed as relieving the carrier from any liability for loss due to negligence;[49] and this rule has been applied to a

the shipment is as last above set out and that the liability of the company shall in no event exceed that value." It was held that the quoted provisions, being ambiguous, did not limit the carrier's liability to the sum of fifty dollars.—Adams Express Co. v. Allen, 100 S.E. 473, 125 Va. 530

(2) A similar uniform express receipt issued by a different express company and accepted by the shipper without reading it, although it did not contain the C. O. D. provision inserted in the receipt in the case last cited, was, under the rule of strict construction as to liability, similarly construed in Mosier v. American Ry. Express Co., 178 N.W. 81, 211 Mich. 19.

(3) Where there was nothing said between shipper and truckman as to the valuation of the goods, or as to terms or conditions of shipment, except as to the consideration, which was based on the size of the package and not on its value, the expression "val $200," in receipt given shipper by truckman, but prepared by shipper, did not limit truckman's liability to two hundred dollars.—Bolton Worsted Mills Co. v. United British Ins. Co., 193 N.Y.S. 688, 118 Misc. 530.

(4) The unintelligible words, "Rel. Val 10.00 per cwt," in a contract of shipment, would not meet statutory demands as to a declaration of value.—Missouri-Kansas-Texas R. Co. v. King, Tex. Civ. App., 265 S.W. 761.

Provision in lease of land for elevator

A provision of a lease of land by a carrier to an elevator company that the carrier should not be liable for loss from fire communicated from the elevator to grain on trains, did not relieve the carrier from liability for loss from its own negligence in performing its duties as common carrier.—Millers' Nat. stipulation that goods destined to, or taken from, a station or siding where there is no agent of the carrier shall be at the owner's risk after unloading or until loaded or while the cars are not attached to trains,[50] particularly where the provision specifically excepts from the owner's risk the risk of the carrier's negligence[51]

A contract exempting the carrier from liability for loss by fire, although in general valid, will not exempt it from loss by fire due to the failure to use ordinary diligence and care in protecting the goods intrusted to it.[52] A provision which exempts the carrier from liability for loss by fire has no application where goods are lost by fire due to the carrier's own negligence.[53] Furthermore, a provision exempting the carrier from liability for damage from heat applies only in the absence of negligence.[54] A stipulation that the carrier will not be responsible for any loss or deficiency in weight,[55] or a stipulation against liability for leakage or breakage,[56] will not relieve the carrier from liability for losses of this character due to the carrier's negligence; and a rule requiring the shipper to give notice when the contents of the package shipped are fragile is not a limitation against the carrier's negligence,[57] and neither is a provision in a receipt exempting the carrier from liability for the loss of certain articles, unless mentioned in the receipt.[58] The same general rule has been applied to exemption from liability for loss due to other causes, such as vermin,[59] thieves or robbers,[60] accidental decay,[61] natural vice or propensity of animals shipped,[62] or loss of market;[63] or damage by reason of sweating or otherwise,[64] or loss or damage by enemies of the government or from any of the dangers incident to a time of war.[65] Similarly, a stipulation that the carrier shall not be liable for any damage by wet must be construed to mean damage by wet not due to the negligence of the carrier or its servants.[66]

A carrier cannot by a stipulation that it is "not to be responsible except as forwarder" relieve itself from liability for negligence of employees of another carrier by whom the contract for transportation by the first carrier is performed.[67]

A contract limiting the carrier's liability for loss or injury caused by delay in transportation does not exempt the carrier from liability for damage caused by delay, where the damage is the result of the carrier's negligence.[68]

A stipulation exempting the carrier from loss while the property is at the place of transshipment will not relieve the carrier if the loss is occasioned by negligent exposure during delay in transportation.[69]

Whether a contract containing a limitation of liability as to value is one relieving the carrier from the consequences of its own negligence is a question on which the courts are divided. The conflict-

Where negligence limitations allowed

(1) Even in New York where, as shown supra § 99, the doctrine was formerly well settled that a carrier could limit its liability for damages arising from the negligence of itself or its servant provided an express contract was made to that effect, the cases broadly held that the general language in a stipulation such as that referred to in the text was insufficient to limit liability for negligence, under the rule that liability for negligence could be limited only by express provision to that effect.—Canfield v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 93 N.Y. 532, 45 Am.R. 268—10 C.J. p 183 note 25.

(2) Notwithstanding the insertion of such clause in the contract of shipment, the carrier was bound to exercise reasonable care and prudence in the transportation.—Canfield v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 93 N.Y. 532, 45 Am.R. 268.

ing views are discussed supra in § 102.

Release of liability for accrued damages. Although the language of a particular contract, viewed in the light of surrounding circumstances, may require a different construction,[70] it is very generally held that stipulations in a contract releasing or limiting liability cannot be construed to exempt the carrier from damages which have accrued to the shipment before the contract was entered into,[71] unless there is a separate consideration for the release.[72] The validity of limitations or releases of damages occurring prior to execution of the contract is treated supra § 104.

§ 113. Operation and Effect of Contracts Limiting Liability

a. In general
b. Limitations as to negligence
c. Limitations as to value

a. In General

A valid contract limiting liability governs the rights of the parties thereto.

Freeing itself by contract from its usual common-law duties does not change the true character of a carrier's employment and it is a public carrier still, with its common-law liability restricted in so far as it may lawfully be restricted by the contract.[73] Where the parties enter into an express contract limiting the liability of the carrier, the contract becomes the rule by which the parties are governed, instead of the general law governing common carriers, if the limitations therein contained are such as the law recognizes as valid,[74] and, if the carrier has not waived or lost the benefit of the limitation under principles discussed infra §§ 115–116, where the damage results from some cause against which the carrier has lawfully contracted, it is not liable.[75] A shipper given an opportunity to ship without lim-

70. Delay in furnishing cars

There being no delay in furnishing cars under the contract under which the shipment was made, the language thereof that the shipper waives and releases all claims arising from, or connected with, the shipment or the arrangements therefor, existing at or before the execution of the contract, including "any delay in the furnishing of cars," relates to prior delay in furnishing them on notice.—Coleman v. Loss at siding

(1) Where shipment of ore subject to Interstate Commerce Act was unloaded at sampling works siding, sampled, reloaded, and sealed, there was an initial shipment from siding, so that under uniform bill of lading providing that property received from sidings shall be at owner's risk until the cars are attached to trains, carrier was not liable where metallics were stolen from car before attached to train—Siebert v. Erie R R, 163 N.Y S 111

(2) A railroad company is not liable for loss of plaintiffs' lumber destroyed by fire while on side track of the company at nonagency station unless it was guilty of negligence, regardless of question whether relationship of shipper and carrier was created before fire occurred under bill of lading governing relationship between parties and providing that property taken from station to which there was no regularly appointed freight agent shall be entirely at risk of owner, except in case of carrier's negligence.—Ashton v. Chicago & N W Ry. Co, 225 N.W. 328, 198 Wis. 618.

Condition of animal shipped

An express company is not liable for death of dog from disease common in locality of destination under provisions of bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability for damage resulting from the condition of the animal shipped—Astugue v. American Ry Express Co., 131 So 62, 15 La.App. 347.

Inaccurate information

Under contract limiting carrier's liability for inaccurate information concerning quarantine regulations, no recovery could be had by shipper for damages resulting from misinformation, in absence of fraud.—

itations cannot take advantage of a valid special contract and then repudiate its conditions or limitations.[76] So, in an action for damages to a shipment of live stock carried under a written contract at a reduced rate in consideration of a reduced valuation, the shipper, having classified them in the contract as calves, could not claim that they should have been classified as older animals,[77] and the same rule applies where a shipper classified his race horse as "ordinary live stock."[78] The fact that the bill of lading exempts the carrier from liability for loss of some articles shipped does not prevent recovery for loss of other articles in the same shipment as to which the exemption did not apply.[79]

Indorsements "S. L. & C," meaning shippers' load and count, on bills of lading do not relieve the carrier from liability for damage to goods properly loaded by the shipper.[80]

Notwithstanding completed delivery to the consignee, contractual limitations of liability are binding on the parties with respect to a loss occurring thereafter from a cause which began to operate while the property was still in the carrier's possession, but such limitations do not apply where the cause of destruction did not begin to operate while the property was in the carrier's possession.[81]

The fact that a special contract is entered into

Manieri v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., 137 S.E. 496, 147 Va. 415.

Articles not rated or enumerated

(1) Where shipper, seeking to recover for loss of diamond pin, failed to indicate on uniform express receipt that trunk contained article of jewelry, and receipt contained clause that carrier would not be liable for loss of jewelry or precious stones, etc., unless articles were enumerated on receipt, shipper failing to meet requirement was not entitled to recover—Kirwan v. Railway Express Agency, 179 A. 924, 118 Pa.Super. 431.

(2) Where an express company's receipt for a package states that the property is accepted as merchandise only, and states that the company will not be liable for the loss of jewelry unless such articles are enumerated in the receipt, and the package in fact contains jewelry, although this is not mentioned in the receipt, the company cannot be held liable for loss of the package either as "jewelry" or as "merchandise."—Yaeck v. Adams Express Co., 69 Pa.Super. 143.

(3) Where a bill of lading provided that carrier should not be liable for articles of extraordinary value not specifically rated in published tariffs without a special agreement, the carrier was not liable for jewelry shipped, unless jewelry was specifically rated in the tariffs, or there was a special agreement to carry it indorsed on the bill of lading.—Gassman v. New York Cent. R. Co., 201 N.Y.S. 740, 207 App.Div. 15.

Damage due to strike

(1) A carrier has been held not liable for damages by delay due to a strike under a bill of lading providing against liability for damage from strike.—Sexton v. Grand Trunk Western R. Co., 260 Ill.App. 448

(2) Thus, if a carrier, after a strike not brought about through its fault, uses every reasonable effort to fill the places of the strikers, and every reasonable effort to obtain men and means to care for property intrusted to it for shipment, which property is lost or destroyed while in its charge, the exceptional conditions operate as a release of the carrier from liability under a bill of lading exempting it from liability for loss caused by strikes—American Fruit Distributors of California v. Hines, 203 P. 821, 55 Cal.App. 377.

Overloading

Stipulation of bill of lading relieving carrier from liability in case of overloading or other injury to live stock unless caused by negligence was binding on consignee—Hall v. Houston E. & W. T. Ry. Co., 121 So. 769, 9 La.App. 577, 582.

Effect of Cummins Act

The Cummins Act, as amended by Act Aug. 9, 1916, making the carrier liable for full value of goods lost in shipment, does not apply to a loss exempted by the bill of lading, but only to valuation in case of loss or damage for which the carrier is lawfully liable, especially where the bill of lading had been approved by the interstate commerce commission, so as to be within the express exception in that statute—Simmons Hardware Co. v. Southern Ry. Co., C.C.A.Mo., 279 F. 929, certiorari denied 43 S.Ct. 96, 260 U.S. 739, 67 L.Ed. 490.

'The bills of lading covering these twenty cars were indorsed 'S. L. & C.' an abbreviation for shippers' load and count in accordance with the Federal Bill of Lading Act (section 21 [49 U.S.C.A. 101]), which provides: 'The carrier may also by inserting in the bill of lading the words "Shipper's weight, load, and count," or other words of like purport indicate that the goods were loaded by the shipper and the description of them made by him; and if such statement be true, the carrier shall not be liable for damages caused by the improper loading or by the non-receipt or by the misdescription of the goods described in the bill of lading.' This statute was designed to protect the carriers against innocent purchasers of bills of lading where the carrier neither loaded, counted, nor observed the condition or loading of the property and to permit the carrier to issue bills of lading indorsed so that the documents themselves will not constitute a representation to purchasers as to the property shipped, its quantity, its condition, or loading. The act and indorsements on the bills of lading in these cases cannot relieve the defendant from responsibility here since the court has determined from the evidence that the melons were properly loaded."—Perkel v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra.

Sheep killed after delivery

Where five carloads of sheep were shipped under a "low value live stock contract," prescribed by the public service commission by virtue of Or.L. § 5878, and after completed delivery by unloading on private spur track some of the sheep strayed on the main line of railroad and were killed by a train, the contract provisions as to the measure of damages and notice of injury were inapplicable, since the cause of destruction of the sheep did not begin to operate while they were in the carrier's possession—Cripe v. Davis, 214 P. 343, 107 Or. 142.

covering a shipment does not altogether eliminate the duty which the carrier owes as custodian, for the violation of which it may be answerable in an action ex delicto.[82] So, where a valid contract fixes the liability of the carrier as that of a private carrier only, the carrier is bound to exercise ordinary care;[83] but where the contract requires the shipper to indemnify the carrier against all claims against it arising out of loss or damage in transportation, except such liability as results from gross negligence of carrier and its servants, the carrier is required to exercise only slight diligence.[84]

Invalidity of a severable provision of a special contract limiting liability will not vitiate the entire contract.[85]

Construction of contracts generally see supra § 112.

b. Limitations as to Negligence

Contracts intended to relieve a carrier from liability for its own negligence or that of its agents are invalid and of no effect.

In accordance with principles stated supra §§ 99, 112 b, where the express language or evident purpose of the stipulation relieving the carrier from common-law liability is to exempt it from liability for its own negligence or that of its servants or agents, the stipulation is against public policy, and is, therefore, void and of no effect; and it has been specifically decided in many cases that no contract limitation will relieve the carrier from responsibility for the negligence, unskillfulness, or carelessness of its employees.[86] Furthermore, if the stipulation is against all liability, it is invalid, for the manifest purpose of such a general stipulation must be to relieve from negligence as well as from other grounds of loss.[87] It follows that a stipulation against liability for injury by fire from any cause whatever is invalid, as fire might be due to the carrier's negligence.[88] The general principle that a contract relieving the carrier from liability for negligence will not be valid is applicable also where it sought to escape responsibility for goods held for delivery, or the like;[89] and a contract limiting liability against delay due to the carrier's own negligence is likewise invalid.[90]

The attempt on the part of carriers to limit their liability as against their own negligence or that of their servants has been particularly persistent where the contract of transportation is with reference to live stock, but such limitations have been uniformly held ineffectual.[91] So, a provision in a live stock agreement, which on express consideration of a reduced rate, limits the shipper's damages for unusual delay resulting from negligence to the amount actually expended in purchase of food or water for the stock while detained is invalid as a contract exempting the carrier from liability for its own negligence.[92] Such a stipulation is not within the principle of limiting liability to an agreed valuation which has been made the basis of a reduced freight rate; nor is it a legal limitation on the amount of recovery, but it is in effect an attempt to limit the carrier's liability for negligence by a contract which leaves practically no recovery for damages resulting from such negligence.[93] The stipulation has been upheld, however, in an action against the carrier, where it appeared that the delay was not occasioned by the negligence of the carrier.[94]

A statutory provision that no parties shall be allowed to deny that they are bound by the terms and conditions of a bill of lading received by the con-

Stock in pens awaiting shipment

A provision in a contract of shipment of cattle, that the carrier does not assume any liability for live stock while remaining in pens awaiting shipment, is void as far as intended to relieve the carrier of negligence.—Akeman v. Wabash Ry. Co., Mo.App., 201 S.W. 590.

c. Limitations as to Value

Limitations as to value are given effect according to the tenor of the agreement if valid.

In so far as any attempted limitation as to value is in violation of public policy or positive law, it will, of course, be ineffectual to prevent recovery of the full amount of the loss;[96] but where the parties have, within the rules stated supra § 102, lawfully agreed on a valuation, or where the shipper, in compliance with a regulation requiring the value to be stated as the basis for estimating the compensation to be paid, has placed a valuation on the goods, such valuation will control in an action against the carrier for loss,[97] and the shipper will not be heard to claim or to recover for damage or loss, however great, in excess of the amount named in the shipping contract,[98] the rule being based on

Duress

Where the only railroad at place of shipment refused to ship cattle unless it was written across bill of lading that some were in bad condition, and although statement was untrue, and shipper, under such pressure, signed such bill of lading, the carrier's act constituted legal duress, and shipper was not barred from recovering damages for their negligent transportation.—Missouri, K. & T. Loss in warehouse

A released valuation clause in an interstate bill of lading, based on difference in tariffs on file, governs, and the shipper cannot recover more, although loss occurs while freight is in carrier's warehouse at an intermediate point, under provisions of one of such tariffs.—Western Transit Co. v. A. C. Leslie & Co., 37 S.Ct. 133, 242 U.S. 448, 61 L.Ed. 423, reversing A. C. Leslie & Co. v. Western Transit Co., 150 N.Y.S. 1073, 165 App.Div. 947.

Nature of cause of action

Whether an action is in tort or on a contract, carrier is liable only for the stipulated value of sheep in consideration of a lower rate.—Paradise Land & Live Stock Co. v. Davis, 207 P. 145, 60 Utah 189.

Computation of damages

Where bill of lading recites that sum named therein is agreed value of goods, in absence of shipper's declaration of higher value, and that rate is fixed with reference to specified value, and that, in consideration of rate, carrier's liability for loss or damage shall be limited to stipulated value, damages are computed in usual way without reference to stipulation, but if, when so computed, they exceed agreed limit of value, no recovery of excess may be had.—The Ansaldo San Giorgio I v. Ignorance of law

Rate based on valuation

Where a shipping contract contains no express provision that carrier's liability is limited to value of stock as set out in contract, the same result as to carrier's limited liability follows from recitals that the rate is based on such valuation.—Kennedy v. Invoice price

(1) In an action against a railroad for damages to dressed poultry shipped under a bill of lading providing for computation of damages on the invoice price to consignee at the time and place of shipment, the measure of damages was not the difference in the market value of the property in the condition in which it should have arrived and that in which it did arrive at the place of destination, but the amount computed on the basis of such stipulation.—St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. v. Texas Packing Co., Tex.Civ.App., 253 S.W. 864.

(2) So, where a shipper delivered cotton to a common carrier for transportation, under a bill of lading providing that the amount of the carrier's liability for loss or damage was to be computed on the basis of the value of the cotton at the bona fide invoice price to the consignee, including freight charges if prepaid at the place and time of shipment, the shipper could not recover the increased value of the cotton since its loss, notwithstanding that he told the carrier that he intended to hold the cotton.—Lesesne v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 103 S.E. 147, 114 S.C. 95.

(3) Under bill of lading providing that liability for damages should be computed on value of goods at bona fide invoice price, measure of damages would be difference between price at which goods sold at delivery and invoice or fair market value at place and time of shipment.—Wallingford v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 167 P. 1136, 101 Kan. 544, L.R.A. 1918B 716.

(4) Difference between invoice price of interstate shipment at place of shipment and value when delivered in its damaged condition was the proper measure of damages for loss by carrier's failure to re-ice, under a stipulation in the bill of lading for computation of value at place of shipment.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Texas Packing Co., Tex., 37 S.Ct. 487, 244 U.S. 31, 61 L.Ed. 970.

(5) So, under a bill of lading providing that amount of any loss or damage for which carrier was liable should be computed on basis of value of property being bona fide invoice price to consignee, including freight charges if prepaid at place and time of shipment, the extent of damages is measured by the actual loss, which is determined by the difference between the invoice price, with the freight and refrigeration charges added, and the selling price, and it is immaterial what the fruit might have sold for at point of destination. —Crenshaw Bros. & Saffold v. Southern Pac. Co., 181 P. 252, 40 Cal.App. 603, amendment of remittitur and correction of judgment denied 183 P. 208, 42 Cal.App. 44, certiorari denied 40 S.Ct. 14, 250 U.S. 669, 63 L.Ed. 1198.

(6) Under a contract of shipment, stipulating that carrier should be liable for damage computed on the bona fide invoice price, if any, to the consignee, at the place and time of shipment, the shipper of a soda fountain, purchased for one hundred dollars, although actually worth two hundred fifty dollars, could recover only the cost price, where it was destroyed in transit.—Wilson v. Chicago Great Western R. Co., Mo.App., 190 S.W. 22.

(7) Where the catalogue of mail order company, giving premium merchandise as a bonus with purchases, disclosed that such premium merchandise had a fixed cash price, and that customers understood and paid it, such premium merchandise had an invoice price within the bill of forbidden by statute, in which case the value of the goods will be determined in accordance with the general rule, stated infra § 264, which controls in the absence of valid contractual limitation.[4] It has been held, however, that the second Cummins amendment merely limits the maximum of recovery to the value stated in the bill and does not affect cases where the loss is less than that value, so that notwithstanding a provision of the kind under consideration, if the value of the goods at the time of the loss was, through no fault of the carrier, less than at the time and place of shipment, the former value controls.[5]

The mere payment by the shipper of a rate based on a limited value different from that requested by him does not limit his recovery to the valuation corresponding to the rate.[6]

Partial loss. An agreement as to the amount to be paid in case of total loss will not furnish the basis of recovery of damages for partial loss.[7] Where a shipping contract provides that the carrier shall be liable for the value of goods up to a declared value which is less than the actual value, the parties may stipulate that in case of partial loss the recovery should be such proportion of the agreed valuation as the actual loss bears to the actual value of the goods shipped,[8] and where they do so the shipper can recover only according to the agreement.[9] So, although the contrary view has been

(1) Where shipper lost sale of goods under contract through carrier's negligent delay as to a shipment wrongfully sold by the carrier, the jury properly estimated the damages on the basis of the price the shipper was to receive under the contract of sale, instead of following the general rule that the measure of damages for loss of entire value of goods occasioned by delay in transportation is the market value of the goods at destination when delivery should have been made, plus other proximate damage, where the contract price was less than the market price, and the bill of lading provided that loss should be computed on basis of value of property at place and time of shipment—New York, P. & N. R Co. v. Chandler, 106 S E 684, 129 Va. 695.

(2) So, where shipper had sold a carload of potatoes at ten dollars per barrel, f o. b shipping point, and the carrier, with full knowledge of the character of shipment and the importance of prompt delivery, stipulated that the measure of damages in case of nondelivery should be "the value of the property to the consignee at the place and time of shipment," carrier was liable to shipper for such value, since there is nothing in either the Carmack or Cummins amendments to the interstate commerce act which forbids a carrier to stipulate for payment of the full actual loss sustained—New York, P. & N R. Co. v Bundick, Taylor, Corbin-Handy Co, 122 S E. 261, 138 Va. 535.

(3) The right of a shipper to recover his actual loss against a carrier for goods lost in interstate transit, as measured by the sale thereof, is not altered because such loss is consequential only, and not damages or injury "to such property"—New York, P & N R. Co. v. Bundick, Taylor, Corbin-Handy Co., supra.

Value at place of delivery immaterial

A stipulation that the liability for loss shall be measured by the value at the time and place of shipment will preclude a recovery by the consignee for the difference between the market value at the place of delivery and what he paid—Matheson v Southern R Co., 60 S E 437, 79 S.C 155.

In absence of direct evidence of value at place of shipment, the damages for loss of a shipment may be determined with reasonable certainty by deducting the freight and cost of converting the commodity into cash from its value at destination.

Reason for rule

"If the carrier by mistake charged too low a rate there is nothing to prevent it from recovering of the shipper the published rate. . . . The contention of the defendant is in substance that, even though a shipper has declared a high value for the purpose of enabling the carrier to fix a rate, he is nevertheless bound to a much lower limitation of value simply because of the rate actually prepaid; that it is the rate charged and not the value declared which fixes the carrier's liability. That argument is an inversion of sound reason. The declaration of value fixes both the legal rate and the amount recoverable; the rate actually charged does not control a written declaration of value. . . . It seems inequitable to permit the carrier by charging the lower rate to prevent the shipper from relying upon his express declaration of value simply by referring to a published schedule where two alternative rates are stated, the higher one of which ought to have been charged if reliance had been placed on the declared statement of value made by the shipper. Such an interpretation of the law in effect would permit the railroad to elect after the event the course most to its interests, by collecting the balance of the higher rate in case of a safe delivery, and by limiting its liability to the lower value fixed by the rate actually exacted in case of loss."—Aradalou v New York, N H. & H R. Co., 114 N E 297, 300, 225 Mass. 235.

Mistake of carrier

When the shipper makes an express representation of value for the purpose of enabling the carrier to fix the rate, and a rate is fixed by the carrier, which by mistake is based on the theory that a much lower valuation was fixed than that in fact contained in the written statement of value signed by the shipper, the rights of the shipper cannot be affected within the limits established by his declaration of value by the rate which the carrier exacts.—Aradalou v New York, N H & H. R. Co, 114 N.E 297, 225 Mass. 235.

taken,[10] the law is firmly grounded that in cases where a contract of carriage fixes the value of a shipment at so much per pound, per hundredweight, per ton, or at some other unit of weight or measure and the rate is calculated on such agreed value, the recovery, in case of partial loss, is limited to the agreed value, per unit, of that part of the shipment which was lost, for the consignor is estopped from asserting any unit to have a greater value than the per unit value declared.[11] Where the articles shipped are heterogeneous in nature, it has been declared that the correct rule is to adopt as the agreed valuation of each article that proportion of its actual value which the agreed valuation of the whole shipment bears to the actual value of such shipment.[12]

Computation of amount recoverable

Under a bill of lading stipulating that in case of total loss of any live stock covered by the contract for which the carrier should be liable the value was the actual cash value at the time and place of shipment, in no case to exceed ten dollars for each calf, and that in case of injury or partial loss the amount claimed should not exceed the same proportion, a recovery on findings of the jury that there was a depreciation of five per cent on a valuation of thirty dollars, or one dollar and fifty cents per head, limited the shipper's recovery to five per cent of the agreed valuation, or fifty cents per head—Kansas City, M & O. Ry Co. of Texas v. Corn, Tex.Civ.App., 186 S.W. 807.

"In the case at bar, the fact that the released value was stated at ten cents per pound and the weight of the shipment 7,000 pounds, the court is of the opinion what was meant was that the released value should be restricted to $700 and that no one pound or part of a shipment should be restricted to ten cents per pound. In other words, the shipper should be permitted to show the actual value of the goods damaged, and should be permitted to recover, if the proper showing is made, the full actual value of the goods damaged so long as this damage in amount does not exceed the maximum released value of the shipment."—Blum v. Barrett, 207 N Y.S 793, 124 Misc. 358

"The 'released' or agreed valuation is '$100 per net ton' There were 25 tons in this shipment It is insisted that, as the 25 tons constituted a single lot, $2,500 is recoverable for loss of, or damage to, the whole or to any part of the lot. This construction does violence to the language used and is unreasonable. The valuation clause fixes not an arbitrary limit of recovery, but a ratio. In Kansas City Southern R Co v. Carl, 227 U S. 639, 656, 57 L.Ed. 683, 689, 33 S.Ct. 391, where the released valuation clause was applied to a shipment consisting of two boxes and a barrel, and one box was lost, this court said the consignor and carrier must have understood the agreed valuation to mean that the package contained 'household goods of the average per hundredweight of $5' The ratio is more naturally applied where the whole shipment is homogeneous. Under this bill of lading the shipper is entitled to recover not more than $100 a ton for each or any ton damaged or lost."—Western Transit Co. v. A. C. Leslie & Co, 37 S Ct 133, 135, 242 U S. 448, 61 L.Ed 423, reversing A C Leslie & Co. v. Western Transit Co., 150 N.Y S. 1073, 165 App Div. 947.

Apportionment of declared value

Although the terms of the contract are not clearly set out therein, the rule of the text was apparently applied in a case holding that under an interstate contract limiting carrier's liability to fifty dollars, recovery could be had for only twenty five dollars, when only half of merchandise was undelivered.—Mavis Hosiery Co. v. Pennsylvania Transp Co., 239 N.Y S. 713, 135 Misc. 636.

Live stock

In action for damages against live stock carrier, valuations contained in schedules govern damages for killed stock, and recovery for injuries to other stock must be in the ratio of the stipulated to the real value.—Dickerson v Erie R Co., 169 N.Y S. 5, 181 App.Div. 815.

12. S D—Stratton v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 168 N.W 757, 758, 41 S D 79

"Defendants sought an instruction to the effect that each article must be considered by itself and the damage fixed upon each separate article upon the basis that the value of such article did not exceed $10 per hundredweight. Consistent with such requested instruction, it is contended by defendant that, before plaintiff could recover upon any article in said carload shipment, it was incumbent upon her to establish the weight of such article. It needs no reflection to see that such a rule would be absolutely impracticable and unreasonable. In order to meet such a requirement, it would be necessary for a party intending to ship household goods to weigh every knife, chair, sofa, piano, feather bed, stove, etc, and to make and keep an itemized list of all said articles in order to be prepared to make proof in case he suffered loss through the negligence of the shipper, as otherwise the necessary proof could not possibly be forthcoming as to at least the great majority of articles that would go to make up such a shipment Both parties have cited decisions in cases where the articles shipped were of homogeneous nature, in two cases the shipments being of metal ingots, all ingots in each shipment being of the same metal and, so far as appears, alike in their percentage of purity. It is readily to be seen that, where the goods shipped are thus homogeneous, the damage can be based upon the weight of the particular part lost or injured as the valuation of each pound of the shipment is the same, and can in no case exceed the true value or the agreed limited value. But an entirely different situation is presented where the goods are heterogeneous in their kind. . . . The correct rule and one applicable to all cases where there is a limited valuation agreement and where the actual value of the goods exceeds such limited value is to base the loss upon the limited or agreed valuation of the thing injured, lost, or destroyed, adopting as the agreed valuation of each article that proportion of its actual value which the agreed valuation of the whole shipment bears to the actual value of such shipment . . Thus, with the evidence showing this carload of goods to weigh 16,000 pounds, its agreed limited value was $1,600. If the evidence showed the actual value to be $3,200, then the value to be placed on each article as a basis for determining damages

Except where the contract of carriage expressly provides for prorating in the event of a partial loss, however, the emphatic trend is against the adoption of the prorating principle.[13] The rule entertained by the weight of authority is that where the contract of carriage provides that the amount recoverable in case of loss or damage shall be limited to the declared value of the shipment, such agreement in case of partial loss, is to be construed as permitting recovery for the loss or damage actually sustained, the amount recoverable, however, not to be greater than that agreed on as compensation for a total loss; and it necessarily follows that where this rule obtains the shipper is not limited to a recovery of such proportion of the amount named in the contract as the value of the property destroyed bore to the value of all the property shipped.[14] There are, however, decisions which are in conflict with this view.[15]

Under the general rule, the carrier is not free from liability because the goods in their injured condition are worth more than the agreed valuation;[16] nor is the carrier's liability limited to the

would be one-half of its actual value. . . . If the actual value of a shipment is twice the agreed limited value, and a silver spoon worth $1 is lost, the recovery therefor should be 50 cents; if a feather bed worth $10 is lost, the recovery therefor should be $5; if a chair worth $8 is injured, reducing its value $4, the recovery should be $2"—Stratton v. If the carrier had intended to bind the shipper to such provision, it was incumbent upon the carrier so to state in plain and unambiguous language"—Chenango Textile Corporation v Willock, 288 N.Y.S. 270, 276, 247 App Div. 638.

Place and time of shipment

(1) Where bill of lading provides that carrier's liability should be computed at the value of the property at the place and time of shipment, the carrier's liability for partial loss of shipment of paper, where damage exceeded cost at point of shipment, was limited to value of paper at the time and place of shipment plus the freight, if paid—Olcovich v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada, 176 P. 459, 179 Cal. 332.

(2) A shipping contract, providing that payment for loss should be made only on basis of actual cash value at time and place of shipment, but not to exceed value specified, did not, however, require damages to be measured by value at shipping point rather than value at destination in condition in which animals should have arrived, and, in absence of pleading or proof of actual value at shipping point, it was not necessary to take it into consideration.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Harrell, Tex. Civ.App., 273 S.W. 661.

Recovery governed by total charge

Shipper of horses, even if governed by written contract with another covering entire car, was held entitled to have valuation for loss of horse fixed by total charges paid by him and the other shipper in the car.—Hunter v. American Ry. Express Co., Mo App, 4 S.W.2d 847.

Cases distinguished or disapproved

"It is true that in the case of Mallison & Co. v. Barrett, 213 N.Y.S. 652, 215 App Div. 524, this court, upon the principle of estoppel, held that for a partial loss, a shipper could only recover that proportion of the loss which the declared value of the entire shipment bears to the actual value. The language of the shipping contract in that case differed somewhat from that employed in this contract, and it contained no agreement to the effect that the carrier 'shall be liable for the value of the goods shipped within' the limitation of the value declared. The Fourth Department, in the case of Frank v. Michigan Central R. Co., 154 N.Y.S. 701, 169 App.Div. 69, originally adopted, in this state, this prorating theory for a partial loss based apparently upon an excerpt from Hutchinson's 'The Law of Carriers' (Vol. 1, § 429, [3d Ed 1906]). That textbook cites but one authority to support its conclusion, namely, U. S. Express Co. v. Joyce, Ind., 72 N.E. 865, but that opinion in that case, it is to be noted, was subsequently ordered withdrawn, Ind, 76 N.E. 1117."—Chenango Textile Corporation v. difference between the actual value of the goods as received by the consignee and the declared value when that difference is less than the declared value.[17]

Damages for delay or misdelivery. Whether or not a provision in a contract limiting the liability of the carrier to an agreed valuation applies in an action for damages for delay as distinguished from one for loss or injury depends on the terms of the contract, and even in cases involving similar stipulations the holdings of the courts are not uniform. Thus, while it has been unreservedly held that contracts of this nature relate to loss of the goods, and do not preclude recovery for delay or fix the amount of damages for delay,[18] and particularly so, where the contract expressly states that no carrier shall be liable "for the loss or injury to" the property in any amount in excess of the valuation thereof,[19] the view has been taken, although there is authority to the contrary,[20] that a provision, that "the company shall not be liable in any event for more than" the agreed value, is broad enough to include damages sustained by either delayed shipment or wrongful delivery,[21] and that the shipper is not entitled to recover, in excess of the amount permitted by its terms, damages for the interruption of his business caused by delay alleged to be due to the carrier's negligence.[22] As shown supra in subdivision b of this section, however, this rule does not authorize or validate a provision limiting the damages of a shipper of live stock for unusual delay resulting from negligence to the amount actually expended in the purchase of food or water for the stock while detained. A provision that, in all cases of loss of any portion or the whole of the goods, the amount of the claim shall be restricted to the cash value at the time and place of shipment does not limit the carrier's liability for loss resulting from delay,[23] but, although the contrary view has

10 C.J. p. 184 note 43.

Reason for rule

"A reading of this clause in the bill of lading clearly indicates that the loss there referred to is, as is stated in the clause itself, 'the loss of any portion or the whole of said goods or merchandise.' In this case there has been no loss of the goods, either of a portion or of the whole thereof, nor has there been any damage to the goods. The right of action is loss to the shipper by failure of the carrier to make prompt delivery of the goods after arrival. The provision in the bill of lading, that the amount of the claim should be restricted to the cash value of such goods or merchandise at the original port of shipment, clearly indicates that the loss referred to in the bill of lading refers to a loss of the goods themselves, or a portion thereof."—Meyer v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey, 174 N.Y.S. 93, 95, 185 App.Div. 812.

Similar clauses

(1) The rule of the text has been applied to a clause providing that "in the event of the loss of property under the provisions of this agreement, the value or cost of the same at the point of shipment shall govern the settlement."

(2) So, a clause in a bill of lading, providing "that the amount of loss or damage accruing to the owner of said goods, in so far as the same shall fall upon this or any connecting carrier shall be computed at the value or cost of said goods at the place and time of shipment, and that the railroad company or carrier paying such loss shall have the full

been taken,[24] it has been held that a stipulation that the amount of any loss or damage for which the carrier is liable shall be computed on the basis of the value of the property at the time and place of shipment is broad enough to include damages caused by delayed delivery.[25]

Limitations of value to an amount specified have no application in case of loss or injury caused by wrongful or negligent delivery of the goods.[26]

Conversion by employee of carrier. In the case of a conversion or embezzlement by an employee of the carrier, as distinguished from a conversion by the carrier itself, which is considered infra § 115, stipulations limiting the liability of the carrier to an agreed valuation are effective and the shipper's recovery is controlled by the terms of the contract;[27] but a clause which contains no stipulation as to the value of the property intrusted to the carrier and which simply limits the carrier's responsibility to a stated sum, refers to the company's responsibility as a carrier and does not relieve it from liability for the full face value of articles stolen by its employees.[28]

§ 114. Exempt Cause Must Be Proximate

To relieve the carrier from liability under a contractual exemption, the exempt cause must be the proximate cause of the injury.

benefit of any insurance that may have been effected upon or on account of said goods," was meant to cover the loss or damage done to the goods themselves, and does not cover the owner's damage sustained by reason of a mere failure to carry and deliver the goods in a reasonable time. Consequential damages

(1) Under provision in bill of lading that amount of any loss or damage for which the carrier is liable shall be computed on value of goods at time and place of shipment, shipper was held not entitled to consequential damages for delayed delivery, or from inability to use property for any period of time because of damaged condition.—Emil Grossman Mfg. Delivery to wrong person

A provision in a contract of shipment limiting the carrier's liability to a stipulated amount for all loss or damage that might occur to the property from any cause has no application where the goods are delivered to the wrong person, since, as said by the court, "A wrongful delivery was not anticipated by the parties, and cannot, therefore, be within the stipulation."—Clarke-Lawrence Co. v. Weir, 63 N.E. 65, 170 N.Y. 148, 154, 57 L.R.A. 527. The liability of carriers of goods at common law was that of insurers, and proper care and diligence were insufficient to avoid such liability. The duty was to carry the goods and deliver them to the consignee. A breach of that duty imposed liability. The innocent mistakes of the servant in delivering the goods, no less than his willful misconduct in breach of the trust reposed in him, constituted a conversion by the carrier. Price v. Oswego & Syracuse R. Co., 50 N.Y. 213, 10 Am.R. 475. But the contract in suit does not evade the liability, it merely fixes the valuation of the goods when liability is established. . . . The contention of appellant that the agreed value does not conclude the shipper as against the acts of employés outside the scope of their employment cannot be sustained without ignoring the terms of the contract, disregarding the intent of the parties and of the acts of Congress regulating interstate transportation and holding the carrier to a different responsibility than that which it assumed."—D'Utassy v. The loss must be the proximate result of a cause as to which the carrier has exempted itself from liability in order to be relieved from liability under such exemption,[29] and the excepted cause of liability must be the sole cause of the loss, for if the negligence of the carrier mingles with it as an active and coöperative cause the carrier will be responsible.[30] Thus, the carrier is not relieved from liability merely because the excepted cause set in motion the circumstances resulting in the loss if the carrier could, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have prevented the loss after discovery of the danger.[31]

§ 115. Waiver or Loss of Benefit of Limitations

The benefit of limitations of liability may be waived or lost by the carrier.

Defective roadbed

Special contract between railroad and show company, providing that show company should be the hirer of motive power and employees furnished, and that the railroad should not be liable for their negligence, would not bar actions for damages resulting from wreck caused in part by defective condition of roadbed—Bernardi Greater Shows v Boston & M. R. R, 165 A. 124, 86 N.H. 146.

Negligence of wrecking crew

Special contract between railroad and show company fixing railroad's obligations in respect of other matters could not affect railroad's liability for negligent handling by railroad's wrecking crew of show company's property after wreck—Bernardi Greater Shows v. Boston & M. R. R, 165 A. 124, 86 N.H. 146.

Gross negligence

Notwithstanding bill of lading stipulates that property destined to be taken from a station, wharf, or landing at which there is no regularly appointed agent shall be entirely at owner's risk after unloading, the carrier will not be relieved from gross negligence in unloading in the mud and rain, at an unreasonable hour of the night, goods consigned to such point, when the consignee is not present, or could not reasonably be expected to be present, and it is manifest that the goods are of such character that they will be rendered useless by the elements—Annese v. Baltimore & O R Co, 105 S E 807, 87 W Va 588, 22 A.L R 869.

Negligence not proximate cause

Where the bill of lading provides that the carrier would be liable only as a warehouseman for goods not removed within forty-eight hours after notice of arrival had been sent, and the goods arrived on Thursday at 12 55 p. m, carrier's failure to mail a notice of arrival until Friday at 5 p. m. was not the proximate cause of a loss of the goods while in carrier's possession by theft the following week.—Rotundo v. Erie R Co, 198 N.Y S. 688, 120 Misc. 461

Act of God

Under bill of lading excepting liability for damages from act of God, the damage must have been proximately and exclusively due to natural causes which could not have been prevented by the foresight and care reasonably to be expected from the carrier.—Porter Screen Mfg Co v. Central Vermont Ry. Co, 102 A. 44, 92 Vt. 1.

Mobs, strikes, or violence

(1) Although the contract specifically exempts the carrier from all liability for losses caused by mobs, strikes, or violence, it is the duty of the carrier to exercise reasonable diligence to prevent injury by finding another route over which safe and undelayed transportation might be had.—Chicago, R I & P R Co v. Dawson, 248 S W. 558, 157 Ark 460

(2) Irrespective of such a provision the carrier is liable for delay on account of a strike unless it uses all reasonable efforts to procure men to run the trains and avoid delay and consequent damage
Cal—American Fruit Distributors of California v. Hines, 203 P 821, 55 Cal App. 377.
Mo—Warner v St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co, 274 S W. 90, 218 Mo App. 314.

(3) So, although a strike may be in progress, a carrier is not relieved of liability by merely showing a strike, and the consequent delay due in part to it, if, by exercising ordinary care, it might have moved the car from the place of shipment to the place of destination under the schedule in force during the strike.—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co. v. Watts, 271 S W. 464, 168 Ark 804.

(4) Where in the course of a race riot in East St. Louis in 1917, fires were started near railroad yards, the mobs burning down negro shacks in the vicinity, notwithstanding the contract of carriage provides against liability for loss resulting from riots or the consequences thereof, the railroad company is liable for the loss of a shipment, where there was no hostility displayed by the mobs to the railroad company's property, and there was a great delay in sending for an engine to draw the car containing the shipment into a point of safety, it appearing that no sufficient guard was placed around the yards, and no arrangements made by the railroad officials to keep in touch with events—Southern Ry. Co. in Kentucky v. John T. Barbee & Co, 226 S W. 376, 90 Ky. 63, 20 A.L R. 257.

Only ordinary care required

Where agents of carrier apprehend danger of destruction of property in consequence of riot and fires, the carrier being by valid contract exempted from liability for loss from such cause, they are required to exercise only ordinary care to preserve and protect the property.—Julius Kessler & Co. v Southern Ry. Co in Kentucky, 255 S.W. 535, 200 Ky. 713 making a charge in excess of a reduced rate which constituted the consideration therefor,[34] by failure of the carrier to return the goods carried when ordered so to do by the shipper during their transportation,[35] or by an abandonment,[36] or an affirmative repudiation, by the carrier of the contract to carry and deliver,[37] such as a deliberate and intentional refusal to perform,[38] but it is only where the contract is repudiated by the carrier that the limitation is abrogated.[39] The fact that the consignees were not given notice of a loss in transit until long after the shipment was due to arrive does not estop the carrier from relying on a provision fixing its liability on the basis of value at the place and time of shipment, even though the replacement value of the goods was higher when such notice was finally received.[40] The statutory right of a carrier to limit its liability to a certain valuation according to the published tariff, unless a greater one is declared, is not waived by failure to inquire as to value where the carrier's agents were not instructed not to inquire.[41]

Conversion by carrier. As distinguished from the rule which governs in the case of an embezzlement or conversion by an employee of the carrier, which is discussed supra § 113 c, it is frequently held that a carrier, which itself wrongfully converts the goods intrusted to it for transportation, loses the benefit of limitations on its liability; such limitations, it is said, have no application in the case of a conversion.[42] This rule has been specifically applied where the shipping contract provided that the carrier shall not be liable for loss or injury beyond a fixed amount or an agreed valuation,[43] or that the liability of the carrier for loss or injury shall be measured by the value of the goods at the time and the place of shipment;[44] and it follows that where this rule obtains a carrier converting goods shipped under a contract limiting liability to a specified sum is, notwithstanding the contract, liable for the full value of the goods.[45] With respect to interstate shipments governed by the Carmack amendment as amended, however, the view has been taken that the effect of a stipulation limiting liability to a certain amount cannot be escaped by suing in trover and laying the failure to deliver as a conversion,[46]

Facts showing waiver

(1) Limitation is waived by carrier where its claim agent directs shipper to replace article lost at carrier's expense—Wells Fargo & Co. Express v. Townsend & Freeman Co., 204 S.W. 417, 134 Ark. 560.

(2) Where a shipper carries freight to a freight agent of a railroad and discloses the nature and value of the articles, and the agent writes only one article in the bill of lading when the shipment contains many articles, the company cannot escape liability for the negligence or dishonesty of its employees because the bill of lading contains a clause that no carrier shall be liable in any way for any documents, specie, or for any articles of extraordinary value not specifically rated, in the absence of a special agreement, such clause being considered as waived by the failure of the carrier's agent to write the data on the bill of lading.—Illinois Cent R. and it has accordingly been held that it is not the rule under the Carmack amendment that where a conversion has occurred the carrier is deemed to have abandoned the contract of shipment, so that the amount to be recovered is in accord with the measure of damages which obtains in conversion;[47] but notwithstanding the Carmack amendment, that rule has been applied in the case of interstate shipments where there was an actual conversion.[48]

§ 116. By Deviation

A carrier by deviating from the stipulated or customary course of shipment ordinarily deprives itself of the benefit of contractual limitations of liability.

Although deviation from oral directions merged in a written shipping contract will not deprive the carrier of the benefit of contractual limitations where there was no deviation from the written contract,[49] if the carrier deviates from the course or method of shipment stipulated for in the contract, or the one customarily used and which the shipper has the right to assume will be used, it will deprive itself of the benefit of any exemption from liability found in such contract.[50] This rule in no way conflicts with the general rule for the measuring of damages for breach of contract of carriage which limits recovery for breach of such contract to such damages as might reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time when the contract was made as a probable result of the breach.[51]

The doctrine of unlimited liability in case of deviation applies to live stock shipments as well as to shipments of merchandise,[52] and to shipments in interstate as well as intrastate commerce.[53] The simplest class of cases in which this principle has been applied is where the deviation or departure is the proximate cause of the loss.[54] However, it has been pointed out that in some English cases the principle has been applied where it was not possible to say that the deviation or departure was the proximate cause of the loss, but where the loss occurred during the continuance of the deviation or departure; and, also, where the deviation was not the proximate cause of the damage done to the goods shipped, and where it did not occur while the deviation was in effect.[55] The rule has been applied in respect of limitations of liability against loss by fire,[56] and limitations as to the amount of recovery in case of loss or injury.[57]

Unloading for inspection

Where the written contract for the shipment of horses contained no provision for unloading for inspection at particular yards, and the unloading for inspection at the company's own yards was warranted under the quarantine regulation, it was held that, as oral shipping directions to unload at another yard were not binding, such unloading was not a deviation from the route specified, as would deprive the railroad company of benefit, the provisions of the contract limiting recovery.—Marks & Shields v. Reason for rule

§ 117. As to Carriage of Goods Not within Scope of Duty to Carry

Where the carrier is not acting within the scope of its duty as common carrier, it may impose any limitations on its liability as it sees fit, and, accordingly, may contract against liability for damage resulting from its own negligence.

Where the goods offered for shipment are such as the carrier is not bound to accept for transportation, it may, if it chooses to carry them, impose such limitations on its liability as it sees fit; in other words, it enjoys the same freedom of the right of contract as other corporations or persons and may name the conditions under which it will undertake the transportation.[58] This is not violative of public policy.[59]

The general rule, stated supra § 99, that common carriers cannot secure immunity from liability for their negligence by contract has no application when a railroad company is acting outside the performance of its duty as a common carrier; in such case it is dealing with matters involving ordinary considerations of contractual relation; those who choose to enter into an engagement with it are not at a disadvantage, and its stipulations even against liability for its own neglect are not repugnant to the requirements of its public service, but the rule extends no further than the reason for it.[60] There may be special engagements which are not embraced within its duty as a common carrier, although their performance may incidentally involve the actual transportation of persons and things whose carriage in other circumstances might be within its public obligation,[61] as, for instance, the transportation of men and supplies required by a construction company in grading an extension;[62] and a contract for such transportation at reduced rates may validly stipulate against liability for negligence.[63] This principle has also been applied to the carriage of express matter, the view being taken that railway companies although common carriers may contract as private carriers to transport express matter for express companies as such matter is usually carried, and in that capacity may properly require exemption from liability for negligence as a condition to the obligation to carry.[64] Likewise, the principle has been applied to carriers of express messengers, it being held, as shown infra § 636, that the carrier may make a contract by which an express messenger as a condition of the carrier's employment assumes all risk of injury while so riding, whether from negligence of the carrier's servants or otherwise. In further application of the principle, it has been held that a railroad company selling its own property can, as a private carrier, contract with the purchaser to transport it and exempt itself from liability for its negligence in the transportation.[65] Similarly, a railroad company can limit its liability for negligence to operators of a motor car owned by an independent company and run on the railroad with the company's permission.[66] The general rule has frequently been applied in the hauling of circus trains owned by circus proprietors, it being held that the carrier may validly contract against loss or injury to person or property of the circus train from any cause whatsoever, where the carrier furnishes men and motive power to transport the train which is to be operated under the management and the control of the circus proprietor,[67] or where the proprietors of the circus train agree to load and to unload the cars, the carrier's servants having no right to direct the same.[68] A different rule prevails, however, where the railroad acting as a common carrier transports a show company; in such case the principles, stated supra § 99, which prohibit contracts relieving it of liability for its own negligence or that of its servants are applicable.[69]

§ 118. Extending Common Law Liability

The common-law liability of a carrier may ordinarily be extended by contract or statute.

By a special contract the carrier may extend its common-law liability so as to be answerable for loss or damages for which it would not be accountable under the common-law rule, or by statute,[70] provided the contract is not in conflict with the law.[71] Thus, while a private carrier is ordinarily liable only for loss shown to have resulted from his own lack of care, there is no rule to prevent his undertaking to insure the safe delivery of goods intrusted to him for carriage, and if he does so undertake, he will be liable accordingly,[72] but the express exclusion of a particular risk will not by implication extend the undertaking to all other risks,[73] and it has been held that the mere undertaking of a private carrier to carry the goods safely imposes no higher duty than already existed on the carrier's part and renders him liable for losses caused by his negligence, but for nothing more.[74] A constitutional provision that the liability of railroad corporations as common carriers shall never be limited does not prohibit the legislature from increasing the common-law liability of such carriers.[75]

K. SHIPPING RECEIPTS, BILLS OF LADING, AND SPECIAL CONTRACTS

The relations between a shipper and a carrier are contractual in their nature.

The relations between shipper and carrier are contractual, even though the terms of the contract are fixed by law and not by agreement of the parties.[76] In the case of an interstate shipment it is said that the contract between the shipper and the carrier is made up of the bill of lading, and the tariffs, schedules, and other governing rules and regulations of the interstate commerce commission,[77] which are to be read into,[78] and are regarded as becoming a part of,[79] any contract of shipment authorized by and within the scope of the federal Transportation Act.

§ 120. What Law Governs

Subject to limitations which may be imposed by its interstate character, a contract of shipment is governed as to its validity, interpretation, and effect by the law of the place where it is entered into.

In general, the validity, construction, and effect of a contract of shipment are governed by the law of the place where it is entered into;[80] contracts for through interstate shipments are, however, controlled by the pertinent federal laws,[81] the agree-

Carmack amendment
If otherwise entitled to recover, the provisions of the Carmack amendment should be accorded appropriate effect in determining the liability of the carrier to the shipper

ment of the parties, and the common-law principles accepted and enforced in the federal courts.[82]

§ 121. Receipts

While a shipping receipt may be no more than a mere receipt for goods, it may constitute the contract of carriage and is evidence, although not conclusive, of delivery to the carrier of goods of the quantity and condition receipted for.

In general a receipt given by the carrier to the shipper, in so far as it contains stipulations as to the transportation, constitutes the contract under which the goods are to be transported, and its terms are binding on both parties,[83] unless illegal,[84] and will control in determining the rights and liabilities of a carrier and shipper not subject to the Interstate Commerce Act.[85] However, a carrier's receipt is not conclusive evidence of the contract;[86] and, in fact, where such an instrument is and purports to be only an acknowledgment of the receipt of the goods it is not a contract at all, even though it contains a memorandum as to the rate of freight.[87]

Where a receipt is delivered after shipment, under a prior contract, whether oral or written, it will not supersede the agreement under which the shipment was made.[88] On the other hand, if the receipt indicates that a subsequent bill of lading in case of interstate shipments—Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Camper, 78 So. 925, 201 Ala. 581.

Straight nonnegotiable bills of lading, so marked on their face and used in interstate shipment, are governed by the Federal Bills of Lading Act.—Stefani v. Southern Pac. Co., 5 P.2d 946, 119 Cal.App. 69.

The interpretation of contracts must be by state law as the federal acts do not undertake to do this—Turner Lumber & Investment Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 16 S.W.2d 705, 223 Mo.App. 564.

Parties to contract

Whether consignee of interstate freight is or has become party to contract of transportation must be determined by general principles of common law.—New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. v. York & Whitney Co., 119 N.E. 855, 230 Mass. 206, affirmed in part and reversed in part on other grounds 41 S.Ct. 509, 256 U.S. 406, 65 L.Ed. 1016.

Express receipt and bill of lading distinguished

A bill of lading is both the receipt and a contract by the carrier to deliver to the consignee or the holder of a duly indorsed document, and an express receipt serves one purpose, namely, a receipt limiting the carrier's liability in case of loss and damage upon contingencies named in it.—U. S. v. Wells, Fargo & Co., C.C.A.N.Y., 271 F. 180

Uniform express receipts

(1) Uniform express receipts prescribed by interstate commerce commission, pursuant to which shipment moved, together with classification schedules of carrier on file with commission, constitute contract of carriage.—Feynman v. American Ry. Exp. Co., 234 N.Y.S. 727, 134 Misc. 223.

(2) Shippers are presumed to have known and to have assented to the conditions contained in a uniform express receipt constituting the contract under which their shipment in interstate commerce was accepted and transported, which conditions are not inconsistent with public policy nor inimical to the federal transportation law.—Feniger v. American Ry. Express Co., 197 N.W. 550, 226 Mich. 106.

(3) Provision of uniform express receipt constituting the contract under which interstate commerce shipment was accepted and transported, in the form approved by the interstate commerce commission and the Michigan public utilities commission, exempting express company from liability for loss, damage, or delay caused by the act of God, public enemies, riots, strikes, etc., unless caused by its own negligence, is not inconsistent with public policy nor inimical to the federal transportation law.—Feniger v. American Ry. Express Co., supra.

Indorsement on bill not receipt

Act of terminal company's agent in accepting report of captain of ship and indorsing his bill of lading, which indorsement signified that "defendant [terminal company] accepted its obligation as a public service corporation as aforesaid to notify the captain to dock his vessel (in its turn) and to discharge said vessel," was not equivalent to a receipt of the coal for transportation, but was merely the acknowledgment of a tender, and not tantamount to a receipt of the cargo.—Warren v. Instrument held receipt only

Memorandum acknowledging issue of bill of lading, stating that it was solely for filing, and having prefaced to signature statement that signature acknowledged only amount prepaid, can be regarded only as a receipt for money prepaid on shipment.—McRary v. Southern Ry. Co., 94 S.E. 107, 174 N.C. 563.

containing the contract is to be issued, the receipt does not constitute the contract, but will be superseded by the bill of lading when issued, so far as its terms are different from those in the bill of lading.[89]

If the receipt does not purport to contain any contract, but is simply an acknowledgment of the receipt of the goods for transportation, the law supplies the contract and fixes the rights and liabilities of the parties.[90]

The duty of the carrier to transport the goods safely with reasonable dispatch and to deliver them to the consignee at the point of destination exists even though there is no shipping contract,[91] as the mere receipt of the goods, marked with their destination, is sufficient to give rise to contractual obligations, without regard to the issuance of a shipping receipt.[92]

The rules applicable to bills of lading may be applied to receipts in so far as bills of lading are regarded as receipts,[93] and these receipts have been held to be straight or nonnegotiable bills of lading within the acts of congress affecting such bills.[94] A statement on a receipt that a shipment was received subject to the conditions of the uniform bill of lading is of the same legal effect as if the provisions of the bill had been set out in full in the receipt.[95]

Duty to issue. The Interstate Commerce Act imposes on the carrier of goods in interstate commerce the duty to issue a bill of lading, infra § 123, or a receipt, and failure to deliver a receipt as required imposes on the carrier the highest responsibility.[96] In such a case the law implies the obligation of the carrier to deliver the goods to the consignee at the address shown on the shipment within a reasonable time.[97]

As evidence of delivery to carrier. Ordinarily a receipt is not essential to a complete delivery of goods to the carrier for transportation, but when issued is competent[98] and prima facie, but not conclusive,[99] evidence of delivery to the carrier.

Recitals as to quantity or condition. A receipt is not conclusive as to the amount of goods receipted for, it being competent to show, as between the parties, that a different quantity was actually delivered.[1] A receipt showing delivery of the goods to the carrier and reciting that they were received in good order is evidence that the goods were received in good order;[2] but, it is not conclusive of the question, constituting merely an admission, subject to explanation;[3] and the acknowledgment in a receipt that cases of goods were received by the carrier in apparently good condition does not shift to the carrier the responsibility for damage resulting from improper packing, of which the carrier had no knowledge.[4] A recital of what a sealed package is "said to contain" is not even prima facie evidence of the contents.[5]

Indorsement of a shipping receipt has been held to transfer title to the goods.[6]

§ 122. Bills of Lading

A bill of lading is a document issued by a carrier evidencing a receipt of and contract to carry and deliver goods.

ment to the place of destination, is a bill of lading.[7]

A straight bill of lading is one in which it is stated that the goods are consigned to a specified person.[8]

An order bill is one in which it is stated that the goods are consigned to the order of any person named in the bill.[9]

The term "spent" has been applied to bills of lading which have not been produced, surrendered, or canceled although the carrier has delivered the goods represented by them to the person entitled thereto.[10]

"Blind billed." Shipments billed by a carrier without designating a rate of charges are "blind billed."[11]

(1) As Receipt and Contract

A bill of lading is both a receipt and a contract; a receipt as to quantity and description of goods, and a contract to transport and deliver such goods to the designated person on the terms specified.

A bill of lading is twofold in its character; it is a receipt as to the quantity and description of the goods shipped, and a contract to transport and deliver the goods to the consignee or other person therein designated, on the terms specified in such instrument.[12] It is a mere receipt in so far as it admits the quantity, quality, or condition of the goods at the time they were delivered to the initial

When expressing consideration

Wash.—Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co. v. Seattle Grain Co., 178 P. 648, 106 Wash. 1, affirmed 185 P. 583, 106 Wash. 1.

Defenses

A bill of lading issued to a consignor, and held by him, is subject to any meritorious defense against him, like any other contract.—Port Huron Machinery Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 201 N.W. 779, 199 Iowa 295.

Parties

(1) Consignee who is to receive goods only for sale on commission, and notifies carrier to such effect, is not necessarily party to contract of carriage.—New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. v. York & Whitney Co., 119 N.E. 855, 230 Mass. 206, affirmed in part and reversed in part on other grounds 41 S.Ct. 509, 256 U.S. 406, 65 L.Ed. 1016.

(2) A bill of lading is a contract between the transportation company and him who is interested in the shipment.—Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Mark Owen & Co., 41 S.Ct. 554, 555, 256 U.S. 427, 65 L.Ed. 1032, affirming judgment, 1919, Mark Owen & Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 125 N.E. 767, 291 Ill. 149.

(3) A "bill of lading" does not stand for, or represent, the contract between the buyer and the seller.—Hines v. Scott, 248 S.W. 663, 112 Tex. 506.

Written contract

A bill of lading issued by a railroad company is treated as a written contract between the parties thereto.—Houston & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Southern Architectural Cement Stone Co., 245 S.W. 644, 112 Tex. 139.

Evidence of entire contract

(1) A bill of lading issued in accordance with the Carmack amendment requiring it of carriers of interstate commerce constitutes the entire contract.

(2) The terms govern the entire transportation.—Lewis Poultry Co. v. New York Cent. R. Co., 105 A. 109, 117 Me. 482.

To ascertain what contract was entered into, bill of lading must be examined, bearing in mind that it serves both as a receipt and as a contract.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Central Iron & Coal Co., Ala., 44 S.Ct. 441, 265 U.S. 59, 68 L.Ed. 900, affirming C.C.A., 284 F. 250

Bill of lading and shipping order

Bill of lading plainly limiting value of goods to one thousand dollars, if construed with shipping order, blanks in release clause of which were filled by indecipherable scrawl, controls and is not modified by the shipping order.—Aradalou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 114 N.E. 297, 225 Mass. 235.

17. N.Y.—Grand Trunk Western R. Co. v. Makris, 255 N.Y.S. 443, 142 Misc. 807.

Tariffs, schedules, and rules of interstate commerce commission as part of contract see supra § 119.

Reference to tariffs

A shipper is bound by tariffs, referred to in bill of lading, providing that perishable freight will receive ordinary box car service on parts of road without protective service.—Northern Wisconsin Produce Co. v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 234 N.W. 726, 203 Wis. 549.

Uniform bill

Under Interstate Commerce Act § 1, and filed and posted classification requiring the consignor to give notice if he wishes to ship other than under the uniform bill prescribed by the act, where the shipper, without notice of intention not to ship subject to uniform bill of lading, availed itself of the reduced rate of such bill, its conditions were binding upon the parties.—Siebert v. Erie R. R., 163 N.Y.S. 111.

In case of discrepancy

While the bill of lading should conform to the tariffs, rules, and regulations approved by the interstate commerce commission, nevertheless, in case of a discrepancy, the published approved rules govern.—Breazeale v. American Ry. Exp. Co., 137 So. 585, 18 La.App. 59.

by the terms of the bill, and their respective rights and liabilities are regulated thereby.[18]

As contracts, bills of lading are prima facie contracts of both carriage and delivery[19] binding on carrier, shipper, and consignee as well.[20]

(2) As Evidence of Delivery

A bill of lading is prima facie evidence that the goods represented thereby were delivered to the carrier.

The issuance of a bill of lading carries the presumption that the goods were delivered to the carrier issuing the bill,[21] for immediate shipment,[22] and it is nowhere questioned that a bill of lading is prima facie evidence of the receipt of the goods by the carrier.[23] This is true although a statute forbids the issuance of bills of lading, except for goods actually in the carrier's possession.[24] In the absence of convincing testimony establishing mistake, recitals in the bill of lading showing that the carrier received the goods for shipment on a specified day must control.[25] A state statute which is merely declaratory of this rule applies to interstate as well as to intra-state shipments.[26]

(3) As Evidence of Quantity and Quality of Goods

A bill of lading is prima facie evidence of the quantity and quality of the goods delivered, at least so far as external conditions are concerned.

A bill of lading, as between the parties thereto and their privies, is prima facie evidence of the kind and quantity of the goods delivered to the carrier.[27] It is usual to insert in a bill of lading recitals to the effect that the goods were received in good condition or in apparently good condition and such recitals pertain to the instrument as a receipt.[28] A statement in a bill of lading that the goods were received by the carrier in apparent good order is an admission that, so far as external appearance was concerned, the shipment was in good condition when received,[29] and is sufficient to make out a prima

Bill acknowledging receipt of goods from "owners"

Although consignees were also named in bill of lading, as consignors, yet, where carrier acknowledged receipt of shipment not from consignors but from owners, consignees were only prima facie owners of goods shipped.—King v. Barbarin, Mich., 249 F. 303, 161 C C.A. 311.

Recital as to weight

(1) Weights stated in a bill of lading are prima facie evidence of the amount received and the fact that the weighing was done by another will not relieve the carrier where it accepted such weight and entered it in the bill of lading.—Baker v H Dittlinger Roller Mills Co, Tex Civ App., 203 S W 798.

(2) However, the carrier will not be liable if he proves delivery of all goods received although the weight at destination is less than that stated in the bill of lading—Baker v. H. Dittlinger Roller Mills Co, supra.

Rebuttal

The part of bill of lading which is a receipt is only prima facie evidence of what goods were delivered by shipper, and may be rebutted by proof of tender of goods in like order and condition as when received. —Gulf, C. & S. The rule as stated in Corpus Juris has been relied on in support of a holding that a recital in bill of lading that coffee was in apparent good order when received was not contractual and did not amount to warranty as between parties—Cheek Neal Coffee Co v Osaka Shosen Kaisha, D C.La, 36 F 2d 256, affirmed, C. As notice of inherent quality

Bill of lading, stating that shipment was carbonated nonalcoholic beverage, received in apparent good order, does not give carrier conclusive notice of inherent quality of goods, where it further recited that facie case against the carrier that the goods were in apparently good condition so far as ordinary inspection without opening the packages would disclose,[30] and to place on the carrier the burden of proving that the goods were not in such apparently good condition when received, as discussed infra § 254. However, such a statement relates only to external conditions, and it is, of course, open to the carrier to show that the damaged condition existed at the time of the receipt of the goods, but was not apparent on inspection.[31] The statement creates no presumption against the carrier[32] and does not make out even a prima facie case with reference to damage not apparent.[33] The rule as generally stated is that the recital as to the condition of the goods is prima facie evidence only as to that fact, and the carrier may show the contrary;[34] but a recital of good condition may be binding on the carrier when the bill was intended to be negotiated and is held by a bona fide transferee for value.[35] A bill of lading is evidence that merchandise was delivered to the carrier in good condition in the absence of any notation or entry thereon to the contrary.[36]

Where quantity of goods guaranteed. The carrier may by stipulation guarantee the quantity of goods received so that the recital of the bill of lading will be conclusive, even as against mistake, and render the carrier liable for any shortage.[37]

(4) As Evidence of Title

A bill of lading furnishes presumptive documentary evidence of title to the goods represented thereby.

A bill of lading serves as documentary evidence of title,[38] providing proof of ownership if a straight bill, and title to the goods themselves if an order bill,[39] as by mercantile law and usage the bill of lading stands as a substitute and symbolic representative of the goods therein described,[40] and carries the legal title to the consignment,[41] so that, as shown in § 128, a transfer of the bill of lading is a transfer of the goods evidenced by it, and possession symbolized by a bill of lading is the same as actual possession.[42] The form in which a bill of lading is taken is indicative of the title to the goods shipped,[43] but is not always conclusive,[44] as the bill is only presumptive evidence of ownership of the goods.[45] By taking the bill of lading in the name of the consignee the shipper vests apparent title in him;[46] but the presumption to this effect is not conclusive and may be rebutted by special clauses in the bill of lading or by evidence aliunde.[47] The shipper may make a bill of lading in such a manner as to show no intention of passing the title in the goods, but rather to reserve in himself a jus disponendi; whether or not there is such an intention must depend on all the circumstances of the case,[48] but where, except for the form of the bill, the property would have passed to the buyer on shipment of the goods, the seller's property in the goods will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to be only for the purpose of securing payment.[49] If the consignee refuses to receive the goods it will be presumed that the title has revested in the consignor.[50] When, by the contract between the seller and purchaser, legal title has passed to the purchaser, such title is evidenced not by the bill of lading but by the contract of sale.[51]

b. Duty to Issue

It is the duty of the carrier to issue a proper bill of lading, although failure to issue will not prevent the relationship of shipper and carrier from arising.

It is the duty of a carrier to issue a proper bill of lading[52] to the owner of the goods shipped.[53] No particular form or solemnity is required,[54] but the bill must contain a description of the goods,[55] using ordinary care with reference thereto,[56] and refusal to issue a bill except with a notation that goods were in damaged condition, which was not true, is refusal to issue a bill.[57] A uniform bill of lading having been prescribed by the interstate commerce commission, all interstate shipments are deemed to be under the rights and liabilities defined thereby.[58]

Prima facie evidence of title

(1) The naming of one as consignee in a bill of lading is prima facie evidence that the one named has title to the goods consigned—Pacific Lumber Agency v. National Aircraft Materials Corporation, Vt., 182 A. 192

(2) In action for purchase price of lumber, effect of bills of lading as prima facie evidence of title was only to relieve seller in its opening from doing more to establish fact of ownership than to show contents of documents by admissible evidence—Pacific Lumber Agency v. National Aircraft Materials Corporation, supra.

(3) Presumption as to ownership arising from bills of lading became functus officio when evidence tending to show contrary was introduced and burden remained on seller suing to recover purchase price to show that title was as it claimed it to be—Pacific Lumber Agency v. National Aircraft Materials Corporation, supra.

(4) In action to recover purchase price of lumber on theory that president of defendant's grantor in making purchase acted as undisclosed principal of grantor, uncontradicted testimony of president showing that he purchased lumber personally, that it was sold to him on his personal credit, that it was shipped according to his instructions, and that he and not grantor received benefits of transaction so completely rebuts the presumption of title arising from fact that grantor was consignee named in bills of lading as to authorize directed verdict—Pacific Lumber Agency v. National Aircraft Materials Corporation, supra.

Rights of consignee

(1) Carrier's contract to ship goods under straight bill of lading is a contract for benefit of consignee which was party to bill.—State Bank of De Pere v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 248 N.W. 423, 211 Wis. 465.

(2) Consignee's rights under straight bill of lading were not ambulatory and could not be devolved upon shipper's assignee of account against consignee—State Bank of De Pere v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., supra.

F. o. b. contracts

In f. o. b. contracts title passes to the buyer at the time of delivery to the carrier and, although this rule is subordinate to the intention of the parties, the fact that the bill of lading is made out to seller or order does not indicate an inconsistent intention.—Miller v. Proof of refusal to issue

In an action for conversion following sale of goods by the carrier on refusal of the shipper to accept a bill of lading with a notation that goods were damaged, proof that carrier refused to deliver a bill of lading without notation that goods were in damaged condition, where such was not the fact, is sufficient proof of allegation that carrier wholly refused to issue a bill of lading.—Dobbins v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 163 N.Y.S. 849, 177 App. Div. 132

58. Conn.—New England Fruit & Produce Co. v. Hines, 116 A. 243, 97 Conn. 225.

It is not essential that a bill of lading be issued, for in the absence of any such instrument the rights of the shipper and the duty of the carrier are fixed by the applicatory rules of law.[59] Failure to issue a bill of lading as required by the Carmack amendment does not relieve the carrier of liability on a contract of interstate shipment entered into without a bill of lading,[60] and the requisite stipulations of bill or contract as prescribed by the federal statutes or valid regulations of the interstate commerce commission will attach and govern the rights of the parties.[61] A carrier may properly refuse to issue a bill of lading for property delivered to it when the ownership of the property is in dispute.[62] A separate bill of lading is required for each shipment of goods.[63]

Where the relation of carrier and shipper existed but the bill of lading was not yet signed, the rights and liabilities of the parties must be determined under the terms of the standard bill of lading made out for the goods and mailed to the carrier.[64]

An oral contract of shipment is valid,[65] at least so far as intra-state shipments are concerned.

§ 124. Validity

Bills of lading must be just and reasonable in their terms, conforming to the laws regulating them, and issued only for property in the carrier's possession.

A bill of lading is legal when within the policy and edicts of the law regulating the relation between the carrier and him who is interested in the shipment,[66] and the terms of bills of lading of common carriers who are subject to federal laws may be fixed by congress.[67] Bills of lading must be just and reasonable,[68] and, although legal conditions and limitations in a carrier's bill of lading duly filed with the interstate commerce commission are binding until changed by that body, illegal conditions are void even though they are so filed.[69]

No valid bill of lading can be issued unless the carrier has received, or is in possession of, property to transport, or divert beyond its original destination.[70] Where the signature of the agent of the carrier is required, use of a stamped signature of the carrier is not sufficient to sustain the validity of the bill where the stamp on its face indicated it was intended to record only part of the transaction, the remainder of which was to be inserted in a blank left for that purpose.[71] The date has been said to be a material part of a bill of lading.[72] Where no damage results to the owner of goods shipped because of a mistake in naming the consignor, the carrier is not liable for such mistake.[73]

Uniform bill of lading

Where a railroad carrier receives an interstate shipment without issuing any bill of lading or making a contract with the shipper its liability is governed by the terms of a uniform bill of lading published and filed with the interstate commerce commission.—Lazarus v. Wrong person named consignor

A carrier is not liable for damages for its carelessness in inserting the name of the wrong person as consignor, in consequence of which such person was paid for the shipment, where prior to the commencement of suit he had returned the money thus wrongfully paid, although the money was garnished in the hands of the Exchange or reconsignment bills can validly be issued only where the lading received at the point of origin has remained intact.[74]

The terms of an original through bill of lading for an interstate shipment cannot be altered by a second bill issued by a connecting carrier.[75]

§ 125. Delivery and Acceptance

A bill of lading delivered and accepted constitutes the contract of carriage even though not signed, but bills should be signed by the shipper where the statute so requires.

The law presumes that the shipper has assented to, and agreed to be bound by, reasonable and valid provisions in the bill of lading,[76] and when it is delivered by the carrier to the shipper and accepted by him it is presumed to constitute the contract for carriage, whether or not he has signed it,[77] and although he did not read it,[78] although until signed and delivered it does not become a bill of lading stricti juris;[79] but a bill of lading given to the shipper after his goods have been shipped and it is too late for him to recede will not be binding on him.[80]

The shipper receiving the bill of lading is conclusively presumed to have read it and to have acquiesced in its terms, in the absence of fraud, imposition, or mistake,[81] in so far as the provisions therein contained are lawful and not opposed to public policy.[82] Where shippers have been given an opportunity to read bills of lading before signing them, they are bound by them so far as they express the terms of the contract of shipment,[83] but if the shipper is prevented by fraud of the carrier's agent from reading the contract he is not bound thereby.[84] Words written on a bill of lading without the shipper's consent or direction form no part of the contract.[85]

Bills of lading must be signed by the shipper where it is so required by statute,[86] but in the absence of statute need not be signed in order to bind the shipper.[87]

Acceptance by a shipper of a second bill of lading, issued by a connecting carrier, is not a waiver by the shipper of any rights accruing under the original bill issued by the initial carrier.[88]

In determining whether the relationship of shipper and carrier exists, that bills of lading were delivered contrary to the statute may be considered.[89]

§ 126. Construction

Bills of lading are to be construed according to the rules applicable to the construction of contracts generally.

As far as the bill of lading is a contract, the language used therein is subject to the rules of construction which govern other contracts.[90] Being a

Provisions of other instruments referred to

A provision of a through bill of lading, issued by a railroad company for a shipment to a European port, that the property should be subject to all conditions expressed in the regular forms of bills of lading in use by the steamship company at the time of shipment, is valid, and makes the conditions of the ocean bills a part of the contract.—The Susquehanna, C.C.A.Md., 296 F. 461, affirming, D C., 291 F. 698.

Particular bills of lading construed

(1) A description in bill of lading, "one carload of scrap iron," did not import that the contents of the car contract in writing, its construction is a question of law,[91] it is to be construed as a whole,[92] effect given, if possible, to all its parts,[93] and invalid conditions will not necessarily render the whole contract invalid, as it may be enforced as far as it is valid.[94] A consistent, rather than an inconsistent, construction of the various clauses of a bill is to be adopted if possible.[95] It is to be construed according to its terms,[96] and, where the terms employed have by usage acquired a particular signification, the parties will be presumed to have used them in that sense.[97] A bill having been prepared by the carrier, it is to be construed most strongly against the carrier.[98] In construing a bill to determine who is the consignee, admittedly fictitious symbols designating the consignee will be disregarded.[99]

The court will look to the mode of transportation by means of which the contract is to be performed in construing the bill of lading.[1]

Where a bill of lading is silent as to route, its effect is the same as if there was a provision therein giving the carrier a right to select any usual route, and such provision thus inserted by law is as unassailable by parol evidence as any express term of the contract.[2]

§ 127. Effect as Estoppel

A bill of lading, unless properly qualified, may operate as an estoppel, preventing the carrier from denying receipt of goods of the quantity and quality described in the bill. The shipper may also be estopped by the bill.

A bill of lading may contain constituent elements of estoppel and thus become something more than a

could be mixed or mingled without damage, so as to relieve the carrier for improper reloading in transit, it appearing that the shipper had put iron of a different nature in different parts of the car.—L. L. Cohen & Co v Davis, 142 N.E. 75, 247 Mass. 259, reversed on other grounds Davis v. L. L. Cohen & Co., 45 S.Ct. 633, 268 U.S. 638, 69 L.Ed. 1129.

(2) Words, "at which there is no regularly appointed agent," apply to both clauses of following provision of uniform bill of lading, approved by Interstate Commerce Commission: "Property destined to or taken from station, wharf, or landing, at which there is no regularly appointed agent, shall be entirely at risk of owner after unloaded from cars or vessels or until loaded into cars or vessels, and when received from or delivered on private or other sidings, wharves, or landings, shall be at owner's risk until cars are attached to, and after they are detached from trains, or until loaded and after unloaded from vessels."—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v Wilson & Toomer Fertilizer Co., 104 So. 593, 89 Fla. 224.

Separate bills

Where the carrier issues separate bills of lading covering shipments of goods, the undertaking is to carry the shipments separately, and not to permit commingling while in transit.—Inland Waterways Corporation v. Sloss Sheffield Steel & Iron Co., 136 So. 849, 223 Ala. 397.

Change in uniform bill

Consignee

Under P.L.1913 p. 261, the term "consignee," used in a bill of lading, means the person named in the bill as the person to whom delivery of the goods is to be made.—Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Townsend, 100 A. 855, 90 N.J.Law 75.

contract between the carrier and the shipper.[3] Estoppels against a carrier in favor of a purchaser of a bill of lading rest on falsity of representations intending others to rely thereon,[4] and therefore when the carrier issues a bill of lading containing a statement as to the quantity of goods received, with the understanding that the goods may be transferred by means of a transfer of the bill of lading, the transferee is justified in relying on the representations of the carrier made in the bill with reference to the quantity of goods received under it, and as to one who receives the bill in good faith, relying on the statement of quantity, and pays a consideration, the carrier is estopped from showing that it has not received the quantity of goods recited in the bill.[5] To guard against such estoppel the carrier may insert in the bill of lading, "quantity, weight, and contents unknown," or some like clause qualifying its representation, and in that event it will not be liable to an assignee for value if it delivers all the goods received,[6] nor does the estoppel apply to a case where the owner of the property did not purchase it while it was in the hands of the carrier, and therefore did not take title to it through the bill of lading, but the shipment was made by its agent,[7] or where the bill of lading which was for a car shipment of cotton seed showed on its face that the bags were loaded and counted only by the consignor.[8] The principle of estoppel has no application where the bills of lading as delivered did not in fact include goods not received, but were fraudulently altered by the shipper.[9]

Truth of qualification. A carrier will not be relieved of liability by inserting a qualifying clause in the bill of lading unless such clause is true,[10] and hence the carrier is liable where no goods were ever shipped, notwithstanding the insertion of such words;[11] but where true the carrier is not liable for nonreceipt of any part of the goods described.[12]

Packaged goods. When a bill of lading acknowledging receipt of packaged goods recites that the contents and condition are unknown, the bill is prima facie evidence of receipt of the packages, but not of the quantity of goods therein,[13] and is not of itself sufficient to prove a shortage of the contents.[14] Such a recital relieves the carrier of liability for shortage of contents of the package.[15] A recital that goods were received in apparent good

Non-reliance on representation

Where buyer had knowledge of railroad's custom to sign bill of lading prepared in advance by shipper, without verification of the correctness of the weight of goods stated therein, and was entitled by contract of sale to examine the goods and verify the goods before payment of the price, and where the bill of lading stated that weights shown therein were "subject to correction," the buyer, having paid draft with bill of lading attached before arrival of goods at destination, could not recover from railroad the loss sustained on delivery of amount less than that stated in the bill of lading —Houston & T. Weight subject to correction

(1) "Weight subject to correction" has been held to allow the carrier to show that the weight was in fact less than that specified, on the authority of the text and cases of 10 Corpus Juris p. 196.—Davis v. Zimmern, 99 So. 307, 211 Ala. 63.

(2) On the other hand, a bill of lading reciting "weight subject to correction" has been held not to indicate that shipper weighed grain nor to relieve carrier from liability for shortage.—Beacon Milling Co. v. New York Cent. R. Co., 244 N.Y.S. 573, 137 Misc. 865.

(3) The insertion of the words "weight subject to correction" does not destroy the prima facie effect of the recital as to quantity; it merely leaves the matter open to further inquiry instead of being absolutely concluded.—Brown v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 112 P. 147, 83 Kan. 574.

order and condition is not, in the case of packaged goods, an admission by the carrier of receipt of the alleged contents of the packages.[16] A recital of receipt of a package "in apparent good order except as noted (contents and condition of contents of packages unknown)" renders the bill of lading insufficient prima facie to show delivery of the purported contents of the package[17] and is not an admission that the contents were received in good condition.[18] Such a recital will destroy the prima facie effect of a recital that property has been received in apparent good order and condition only when the contents and condition are actually concealed and not observable or the carrier has no opportunity to inspect.[19] The Bills of Lading Act requires, in the case of package goods, only that the carrier count the packages, and, where the bill contains a further statement of the weight of the packaged goods, qualified by the words "subject to correction," the carrier is not liable for a shortage of weight.[20]

Where the goods have been misdescribed but the carrier has disclaimed knowledge of the contents of the packages and the words of description have been added by the consignor, the carrier is not liable for failure of the packages to contain the contents described.[21]

Shipments in bulk. It has been held that the usual statement in the bill of lading that contents and value are unknown will have no application to material shipped in bulk as to which the carrier has full opportunity to advise itself, and the quantity stated will be binding on it.[22]

Liability for goods actually received. Although the bill of lading is marked "shipper's load and count," the carrier is liable for whatever he actually receives from the shipper.[23] The insertion of the words "shipper's load and count" will not, of course, relieve the carrier of liability for goods actually delivered to and accepted by it,[24] but such a statement does not affect the liability of the carrier for the actual contents,[25] nor do the words "received in apparent good order except as noted (contents and condition of contents of packages unknown)."[26]

Where no goods received. As between the shipper and the carrier, when no goods have been delivered for shipment no recitals in the bill can estop the carrier from showing the true facts,[27] but as against a third person a carrier may, as shown in § 141, be bound by a bill of lading issued by an authorized agent even though no goods have been received.

Between the consignor of goods and a receiving carrier, recitals in a bill of lading as to the goods shipped raise only a rebuttable presumption that such goods were delivered for shipment.[28] As be-

§ 128. Negotiability and Transfer

a. In general
b. Who may transfer
c. Mode of transfer
d. Effect of transfer
e. Limitations on negotiability
f. Bona fide purchasers
g. Warranties arising out of transfer
h. Delivery for collection

a. In General

The negotiability of bills of lading depends primarily on their terms and the provisions of the statutes, if any, under which they are issued.

Under the provisions of the federal Bills of Lading Act and the Uniform Bills of Lading Act which has been adopted in many states, the negotiability of a bill of lading depends primarily on whether it is a straight bill or an order bill.[32] Under these acts straight bills of lading are deemed nonnegotiable, even though indorsed,[33] while order bills are negotiable.[34] The negotiability of an order bill is not affected by a provision that someone other than the consignee is to be notified of the arrival of the goods at their destination;[35] however, the statutory provision that the insertion in an order bill of the name of the person to be notified of the arrival of goods shall not limit the negotiability of the bill nor constitute notice to a purchaser thereof of any rights or equities of such person in the goods applies only to contests with a purchaser of the bill and has no application to contests between the carrier and a shipper who is the holder and in possession of the bill.[36] Where a bill is nonnegotiable, failure so to mark it does not make it negotiable.[37]

Bills made out to a consignee or "assigns" have been variously held to be order bills and negotiable,[38] and straight bills and nonnegotiable.[39]

b. Who May Transfer

Under statutory provisions as to negotiability, bills of lading may be negotiated or transferred by such persons as the statutes contemplate. Transfer so as to pass title to the goods may be made by a consignee having title, or by a consignor reserving the jus disponendi.

Under the express provision of the statutes mentioned in the preceding section, an order bill may be negotiated by any person in possession of the same, however such possession is acquired, if by the terms of the bill the carrier undertakes to deliver the goods to the order of such person, or if at the time of negotiation the bill is in such form that it may be negotiated by delivery. Other provisions of the statutes in so far as they provide for the manner of negotiation by particular persons, are considered in § 128 c.

Where the title of the goods is in the consignee, a transfer of the bill of lading, so as to pass title to the goods, may be made by him.[40] If, however, the consignor has retained the jus disponendi he may transfer the bill of lading,[41] but not otherwise.[42] Nothing in the federal law prohibits the consignee from orally authorizing the seller to bill the shipment in the consignee's name and transfer the bills to others.[43]

c. Mode of Transfer

Bills of lading may be transferred by assignment, or indorsement and delivery, and, in a proper case, by delivery alone

The transfer of a bill of lading so as to pass to the transferee, for value, whatever title the transferor had at the time, may be by indorsement and delivery of the instrument.[44] The indorsement may be in blank,[45] but a mere indorsement, without delivery, does not satisfy the requirements of the rule,[46] nor will mere delivery, without indorsement, where indorsement is required.[47] However, where bills of lading are transferable by indorsement and delivery, a formal assignment is not, in the absence of a statute requiring it, necessary to a valid transfer and the mere delivery of the bill of lading without a written indorsement, if made with the intention of passing title to the goods, is sufficient to effect that purpose.[48] Even the fact that the bill of lading is drawn to order does not prevent its trans-

Effect of delivery of goods to another

A transfer of title by indorsement of bills of lading covering sea and land transportation is not defeated as between the parties by delivery of the goods to an agent designated by the buyer at the termination of the sea voyage.—Wiekens v. Scheuer, 204 P 780, 118 Wash 614.

The text of Corpus Juris has been referred to in an action to recover from railroad company value at destination of hay shipped under order bill of lading, in support of the proposition that possession by plaintiff of order bill of lading indorsed by shipper was evidence of plaintiff's ownership of hay and his right to proceeds of sale of same, and no further evidence of sale, transfer, or assignment by predecessors in title was required.—Temple v. Transfer for value

It is questionable whether federal Uniform Bills of Lading Act § 29, 49 U.S.C.A. § 109, providing a bill may be transferred by holder by delivery, extends to an order bill of lading, since the only specific bill designated therein is a straight bill, but if an order bill is within the purview of this section, as well as within section 113, providing that, when the bill is transferred for value, the transferee acquires the right to compel indorsement to him, the transfer must be for value, and the parties must intend either expressly or impliedly to transfer the title.—Davis v. Fruita Mercantile Co., 220 P. 983, 74 Colo. 247.

This, it is said, is an apt and usual way of passing title in the usual course of trade.—Ladd, etc., Bank v. Commercial State Bank, 130 P. 975, 64 Or. 486, 49 L.R.A.,N.S., 657.

The rule applies even though the instrument contains no words of negotiability, if the delivery of the instrument is intended to have that effect.—Davenport Nat. Bank v. Homeyer, 45 Mo. 145, 100 Am.D. 363.—10 C.J. p 204 note 50.

Intent essential

(1) Delivery of an unindorsed bill of lading constitutes a good symbolical delivery of the goods represented by the bill of lading only when such was the intent and purpose of the parties.—Florence, etc., R. Co. v. Jensen, 108 P. 974, 48 Colo. 28.

(2) Delivery of a bill to enable the buyer to inspect the goods does not constitute a transfer of title to the goods to the buyer.—St. Joseph Hay & Feed Co. v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., Mo.App., 185 S.W. 1162

Shipper's order

(1) It has been held that a shipper's order bill must be indorsed by the shipper.—Lamborn v. Lake Shore Banking & Trust Co., 188 N.Y.S. 162, 196 App.Div. 504, affirmed 132 N.E. 911, 231 N.Y. 616.

(2) Where a shipper's order bill of lading in favor of the consignee was attached to a draft drawn by a consignee in favor of a bank, fact that bill of lading was not indorsed by consignee would not affect right of bank to proceeds when collected, as assignment could be proven in some other way.—West Texas Nat. Bank v. Wichita Mill & Elevator Co., Tex.Civ.App., 194 S.W. 835

(3) That a shipper's order bill of lading in favor of consignee was attached to a draft drawn by consignee in favor of bank with notation on face of draft to the bill of lading attached was itself sufficient assignment of bill of lading upon its delivery with attached draft to bank. —West Texas Nat. Bank v. Wichita Mill & Elevator Co., supra.

Effect of delivery

It has been said that, even if delivery to plaintiff, without indorsement, of a bill of lading by the one entitled by its terms to the goods did not give a right of action thereon against the carrier, it would be some evidence of waiver of the requirement that without the indorsement the carrier's agent recognized plaintiff's right to the goods, and that the carrier issued to him a voucher for the value of the lost part of the goods shipped.—McMeekin v. Southern R. Co., 64 S.E. 413, 82 S.C. 468.

fer by delivery to a third person without any indorsement,[49] but under the express provision of the Bills of Lading Act order bills may be negotiated by delivery only when indorsed by the person to whose order the goods are deliverable, and a transferee of an unindorsed order bill will take only such title as his transferor had.[50] When an order bill of lading has been indorsed in blank by the person to whose order the goods are deliverable it may be negotiated by delivery.[51] The presumption of ownership of the property arising from the possession of a bill of lading indorsed to the order of the holder may be explained or rebutted by other evidence showing where the real ownership lies.[52]

As a straight bill of lading cannot be negotiated free from existing equities, indorsement of such a bill can give the transferee no more rights than he would have if the bill was not indorsed.[53]

To constitute an assignment of a bill of lading so as to transfer title to the goods there must be a delivery, actual or constructive, of the bill.[54] A straight bill of lading is assigned or transferred by delivery.[55]

(2) Transfer of contract

(1) Transfer of Title and Right to Goods

(b) Transfer as security; bill with draft attached
(c) Transferee's rights as to creditors

(a) In General

Transfer of a bill of lading passes title to the goods represented thereby, while in the possession of the carrier, as effectually as if the goods themselves were delivered, where such is the intention.

As symbols of property therein receipted for, as said in § 123, bills of lading are transferable so as to pass title to the goods represented thereby while in the possession of the carrier as bailee, when such is the intention, as effectually as if the goods themselves were delivered,[56] and such transfer confers the right to the property without the taking of actual possession of it or the doing of any further act to perfect title.[57] Nevertheless the question of intention in making the transfer is of controlling importance,[58] and what actually was the intention of the parties in making the transfer may be shown just as it may be shown that the delivery of goods is for some other purpose than for transferring title,[59] and where the intention not to transfer title fully appears, transfer of the bill of lading does not give title to the goods to the possessor.[60]

The transferee has the right to rely on the terms of the bill of lading when purchasing it.[61]

A straight bill of lading cannot be negotiated free from existing equities,[62] and the transferee can take no better title to the goods than his transferor had.[63] In view of the nonnegotiability of a straight bill of lading, the naming of one as consignee gives him no better title than would an assignment of the bill to him had the consignor been named consignee.[64]

Delivery to carrier. Delivery to the initial carrier of indorsed bills of lading entitling the holder to receive the goods, after refusal of the consignee to accept the goods, is tantamount to a constructive delivery to the carrier for reshipment.[65]

Constructive transmutation

By indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading to another a constructive transmutation of the property is worked, and the carrier, who was the agent for the consignee, becomes the agent of the indorsee, if it has actual possession of the property.—Storey v. Hershey, 19 Pa.Super. 485

Possession as evidence of ownership

The possession of a bill of lading, whether indorsed or not, is presumptive evidence of ownership of goods therein described as against any person not showing a better title.—National Bank of Ashtabula v. Bradley, D.C.N.Y., 264 F. 700.

Estoppel of carrier

Where persons, after shipping goods by a vessel consigned to themselves, sell the goods while in transit, surrender the bill of lading, take delivery orders, and assign them to the purchasers, and the purchasers demand the goods and receive part of them, the carrier is not estopped, in an action by the shippers for conversion, because of failure to deliver the balance of the goods, to deny the shippers' title.—Sweeney v. Right to purchase price

(1) Where the seller of goods has, before shipment, arranged to assign the nonnegotiable bills of lading, manifesting an intent to make only conditional delivery to the buyer, and the buyer, before accepting the goods, has notice of the claims of the assignee, he becomes a purchaser directly from the assignee.—Dewberry-Hargett Co. v. signee for the purchase money of goods and the draft with the bill of lading attached is indorsed or transferred to some one who discounts the draft, a special property in the goods passes to the transferee subject, however, to be divested by acceptance and payment of the draft,[67] and this is likewise true where the goods are consigned to the shipper and the draft is drawn on a prospective purchaser[68] or other third person,[69] or where a purchaser of goods transfers to a bank or other third person the bill of lading with draft on the purchaser attached, and the transferee pays the draft.[70] However, the Reservation of title in shipper

Time drafts

(1) In absence of special agreement, purchaser of time draft with bill of lading attached acquires title to property described conditional upon acceptance of draft by drawee, and not upon the ultimate payment of the draft.—Helburn Thompson Co. v. All Americas Mercantile Corp., 167 N.Y.S. 711, 180 App.Div. 167, affirmed 119 N.E. 1048, 223 N.Y. 675.

(2) Where purchaser of ninety-day drafts with bills of lading attached turned over the property on acceptance of drafts, it released right of lien on goods, and in absence of specific agreement therefor, could not claim an implied trust in the goods or the proceeds thereof.—Helburn Thompson Co. v. All Americas Mercantile Corp., supra.

Tender of payment

A consignee, who paid freight under agreement with consignor, could not recover amount paid from holder of draft because of failure to surrender warehouse receipt issued in lieu of the bill of lading on tender of payment of draft.—First Nat. Bank v. Gidden, 162 N.Y.S. 317, 175 App.Div. 563, affirmed 122 N.E. 880, 225 N.Y. 698.

As otherwise expressed, the transfer by indorsement of a bill of lading to a shipper's order with draft attached vests title to the goods in the transferee as purchaser or pledgee, as the case may be.—Schéuermann v. Monarch Fruit Co., 48 So. 647, 123 La. 55.

Legal title in purchaser

Where bill of lading in favor of drawer is by him indorsed to bank with draft attached and draft is paid to drawer by bank, the transaction transfers the legal title of the property called for in bill of lading to bank.—Marsh Milling & Grain Co. v. Guaranty State Bank of Ardmore, 171 P. 1122, 69 Okl. 222, L.R.A. 1918D 704

Nature of draft as between consignor and purchasing bank

Where plaintiff bank purchased from consignor draft attached to bill of lading, naming the owner as consignee and directing that drawee be notified, the draft as between plaintiff and the owner was a bill of exchange, and upon its nonacceptance plaintiff had the immediate right of recourse thereon against the consignor.—Peninsular Bank of Detroit v. Citizens' Nat. Bank of Knoxville, 172 N.W. 293, 186 Iowa 418, 19 A.L.R. 547.

Ownership of draft attached

Where bill of lading with draft attached was indorsed and delivered by a customer to a bank, and bank credited amount thereof to customer with right to check, relation is that of debtor and creditor, and bank became owner of draft with right to dispose of it at its pleasure, fact that bank had right to charge back such draft if it were dishonored does not go to title of draft, as bank had such right as matter of law.—Weed v. Boston & M.R.R., 128 A. 696, 124 Me. 336, 42 A.L.R. 487.

Transfer of invoice not transfer of title

Where a firm sold goods to plaintiff and shipped to its own order, "notify" its broker, and forwarded the bill of lading to the broker who paid the freight and surrendered the bill to the carrier, and thereafter the firm drew on a bank and assigned the draft and invoice to the bank, the transfer of the invoice for the purchase price did not pass title to the goods to the bank, it being merely a transfer of the debt.—Cox v. party who pays the draft cannot use the title thus obtained to enable the consignor to defeat the collection by the purchaser of a debt due him by the consignor.[71]

The nature of the special property in the transferee, that is, whether it is as absolute owner or as security for the payment of the draft, depends, in its final analysis, on the intention and contract of the parties,[72] and while a bill of lading may be transferred under such circumstances as to show conclusively the intention to rest in the transferee the shipper's title to the property covered by the bill,[73] and it has been said that the discounting party takes title to the property described in the bill as completely as if it had been passed by deed and delivery of the goods,[74] ordinarily the discounting party does not become a common purchaser of the property but does acquire some kind or character of special property, claim, or lien on that property to protect it in the payment of the draft which it has purchased.[75] The goods are pledged for the payment of the draft,[76] and the party paying the draft is entitled to possession of the goods until the draft is paid in full.[77] The position of the transferee, it is said, is similar to that of a mortgagee in possession,[78] and he is under no necessity to file papers to preserve his lien.[79] This right of the transferee before payment of the draft is superior to that of the shipper,[80] who, after delivery of the bill and discount of the draft, cannot by any subsequent acts affect the transferee's rights.[81]

On refusal of the consignee to pay the draft, the title of the party discounting it becomes absolute,[82] and when the drawee refuses to accept the goods the fact that the bank sells them will not prevent its collecting on the draft.[83]

The right to the goods or their proceeds is not lost as against the shipper or his assignee for the benefit of creditors by a surrender of the bill of lading to the shipper under an agreement that, until advances have been paid, he will hold the goods or their proceeds if sold under lien as agent of the party paying the draft,[84] and the title of the payee of the draft attached to the bill of lading is not affected by a sale of the goods to a bona fide purchaser by the drawee of the draft who has obtained them without authority or knowledge of the payee and without having paid the draft.[85] Where the party who has advanced money on the draft after a levy on the goods as the property of the consignor filed a claim thereto, his right to maintain this claim was not lost merely because, while the claim case

Whether sale or transfer as security

(1) Although delivery of bills of lading to the shipper's order to a bank places the legal title to the shipment in the bank, whether there is a sale of the shipment, or merely a transfer of title for security, depends upon the intention of the parties.—Cochrane v. Right of bank unaffected by acts of depositor

(1) Where a bank discounted drafts attached to a bill of lading, and gave credit to the depositor, who was already indebted, allowing the depositor to withdraw the excess, the bank became the owner of the property specified in the bill of lading, notwithstanding the depositor's attempts to induce the consignee, on whom the drafts were drawn, to dispose of the property; this being particularly true where the deposit slip giving credit contained no reservation—National Bank of Ashtabula v. Bradley, D C N.Y., 264 F. 700.

(2) Where a bank discounted drafts with bills of lading attached, and gave the depositor credit, which he withdrew, the rights of the bank were not affected, because a relative of the depositor subsequently gave a note to secure other indebtedness due the bank, on which the depositor made payments, etc—National Bank of Ashtabula v. Bradley, supra.

was pending, the drawee refused to accept the goods and pay the draft, and in consequence the bill of lading was "indorsed over" to the consignee for the sole purpose of having him dispose of the goods for the exclusive benefit of the party filing the claim.[86] On receipt by the consignee of the property, and its conversion, he is liable to the party discounting the draft for the money advanced on it;[87] this is true where the party obtaining the goods is a buyer from the consignee,[88] and the discounting party may maintain an action in trover.[89]

A consignee who advances money on transfer to him of apparent title by the bill of lading acquires a title to or a lien on the goods regardless of the claims of those who, without having received actual or constructive possession, seek to assert their rights to such goods through the shipper.[90]

Where a seller places a true bill of lading in a bank and gives the buyer a forged bill with which he obtains the property, the buyer should be regarded as an equitable assignee of the seller, entitled, on recovery by the bank of a judgment against the carrier for conversion, to any balance remaining after payment of the debt secured by the true bill.[91]

Liability on discount or agreement to accept. An agreement by a bank to honor drafts upon a purchaser with bill of lading attached is not an assumption of direct liability for payment or performance of the purchaser's contract,[92] and before the bank can be held liable on its agreement to accept the drafts there must be a compliance by the shipper with its terms on its part.[93] Where a bank purchases drafts with bills of lading attached from the consignor for value and without notice of fraud, and the consignees fully pay the drafts, the bank is not liable to any one injured by the transaction for the fraud of the consignor in making out the bills of lading.[94]

Where the buyer of goods has given checks to the seller and deposited the bills of lading with drafts attached in a bank to obtain money to cover the checks, the bank cannot disclaim liability for payment of the checks and at the same time claim absolute title to the goods.[95]

Consideration for transfer. Where the owner of goods, being indebted to a bank, gives it a bill of sale, and the bank permits the issuing of a bill of lading, the transaction evidences valuable consideration for the subsequent transfer of the bill of lading and drafts to the bank.[96]

Right to recover property

(1) Where the bank purchasing a draft on the buyer of grain and the attached order bill of lading, permitted the grain to be delivered to the buyer for storage, and the buyer afterward refused on demand to pay the draft or deliver the grain, the bank was entitled to sue in trover.—Southern Flour & Grain Co. v. Central Texas Exch. Nat. Bank, 109 S.E. 685, 27 Ga.App. 524.

(2) Where the bank permitted it to be delivered to the buyer for storage to prevent damage to the grain, it did not surrender its title thereto.—Southern Flour & Grain Co. v. Central Texas Exch. Nat. Bank, supra.

(3) Where the bank permitted delivery to the buyer for storage, and the sellers thereafter agreed that the buyer might hold it as margin to protect against loss on other shipments, the doctrine that the one of two innocent persons who put it in the power of a third person to inflict injury must bear the loss could not be invoked against the bank's legal rights.—Southern Flour & Grain Co. v. Central Texas Exch. Nat. Bank, supra.

(4) Where the sellers of grain deposited bill of lading and draft for the price with the bank, the sellers' representative in agreeing that the buyer might hold such grain as a margin against loss on other shipments has been held not acting for or on behalf of the bank.—Southern Flour & Grain Co. v. Central Texas Exch. Nat. Bank, supra.

(5) Direction of a verdict for the bank in trover for the amount of the draft with interest is proper under Civ. Code 1910 § 5930, where the buyer had sold the grain for more than the amount of the draft.—Southern Flour & Grain Co. v. Central Texas Exch. Nat. Bank, supra.

(6) The bank was entitled in trover to recover the amount of the draft with seven per cent. interest, when such amount was not more than the highest proved value of the grain between the date of the conversion and the trial.—Southern Flour & Grain Co. v. Central Texas Exch. Nat. Bank, supra.

loans or advances carries with it the right to control the property described in the bill.

A bill of lading may be pledged to secure a loan,[97] such as a loan to finance the purchase of the goods,[98] and if made in good faith such pledge is valid against the pledgor or any third person.[99] Where a negotiable bill of lading is pledged as collateral security for a loan, the pledgee does not lose his lien on the goods by returning the bill to the pledgor temporarily on a trust receipt.[1] Where bills of lading have been hypothecated against payment of the drafts, the right to sell the collateral persists even after delivery of the bills to the acceptor, and such delivery does not release the drawer to the payee of the drafts to whom the bills were pledged.[2]

Assignment of a bill of lading by a shipper to a bank to secure advances to the shipper carries with it the control of the goods.[3]

Where a consignee in a straight bill of lading knows the bill with draft attached has been transferred to a bank to secure a loan he has no right to sell the goods and apply the proceeds on an indebtedness due him by the consignor without paying the draft.[4]

(c) Transferee's Rights as to Creditors

The rights of a transferee of a bill of lading are superior to subsequent attaching creditors of the transferor. On transfer of a straight bill the transferee, to preserve his rights over creditors, must give notice of the transfer as required by statute.

In the absence of any showing of fraud,[5] the right of a transferee of a bill of lading is superior to that of the shipper's subsequent attaching creditors,[6] for the reason that no attachable interest re-

Title to goods

Bank accepting draft, indorsed in blank by payee, with bill of lading attached, pledged as security for loan, became holder of draft in due course and took title to goods described in bill.—Anderson v. Keystone Chemical Supply Co., 127 N.E. 668, 293 Ill. 468.

3. Pa.—State Bank of Avon v. Luff, 112 A. 452, 269 Pa. 199.

Effect of assignment

(1) The assignment of a bill of lading to a bank advancing money to the shipper with which to fill the consignee's order, carried with it the control of the goods, with the right to stipulate for a note before delivery of the bill to the consignee.—State Bank of Avon v. Luff, 112 A. 452, 269 Pa. 199.

(2) Where defendant had advanced money to a manufacturer under an agreement that it might deduct twenty-five per cent on subsequent purchases, and subsequently gave the manufacturer an order for goods, agreeing to give a note for a specified amount, and a bank which had advanced to the manufacturer amounts in excess of the amount of the note made a further advance to enable the manufacturer to fill the order on the manufacturer's agreement to assign the bill of lading, and surrendered the bill of lading to defendant on the express condition that the note would be given, defendant had no right to set off its claim for the amount due from the manufacturer against the bank.—State Bank of Avon v. Luff, supra.

(3) Where defendant, when sued for the breach of the promise to give a note did not set up a bailment, but claimed an unqualified right to deduct the entire balance due it, plaintiff was entitled to a verdict if the note was to be given after inspection of the goods, but was entitled only to the amount in excess of defendant's claim if there was no agreement to give the note for a particular amount.—State Bank of Avon v. Luff, supra.

Sufficiency of notice of right of transferee

Where straight bill of lading of interstate shipment and draft were discounted with a bank, presentation to factor consignee of the draft with bill of lading attached was sufficient notice to the consignee of the rights of the bank to be paid out of a sale of the shipment, under Act Congr. August 29, 1916, c. 415 §§ 2, 3, 29, 32.—George F. Hinrichs, Inc. v. Standard Trust & Savings Bank, C.C.A.N.Y., 279 F. 382, certiorari denied 42 S.Ct. 462, 258 U.S. 629, 66 L.Ed. 800.

mains in the shipper.[7] The same is true where the bill of lading is given as collateral security for advances to a consignee.[8] The rule applies although no money has actually been advanced to the consignor before the attachment. It is sufficient that the consignor has been given credit therefor,[9] and it is immaterial that the shipper has not checked against the credit.[10] In the application of the rule it is likewise immaterial that the party paying the draft had obtained a guaranty from the consignee

As respects attachment, a transfer of title of goods by an importer by indorsing bill of lading to a bank advancing the purchase price is not invalid as against the creditors of the importer because of the importer's right to obtain the goods by paying the purchase price, where the importer had never been in possession of the goods.—Wickens v. Scheuer, 204 P. 780, 118 Wash. 614.

As affected by rules of bank

Rule of bank that, in receiving drafts, it shall act only as agent for the depositor, applies only between the bank and its customer, and does not constitute the bank, which discounted drafts attached to a bill of lading, a mere agent of the owner as against an attaching creditor.—National Bank of Ashtabula v. Bradley, D.C.N.Y., 264 F. 700.

Seizure as conversion

Where, after a bank had discounted drafts with bills of lading attached, the sheriff seized the grain shipped under a judgment against the consignor an action for damages for conversion may be maintained against the sheriff.—National Bank of Ashtabula v. Bradley, D.C.N.Y., 264 F. 700.

Drafts on several purchasers with refusal by one to pay

Where a carload of seed corn was sold to three purchasers at the same point, and bill of lading, with three drafts attached, one on each of the purchasers, was indorsed to a bank which discounted the drafts, the bank's special property was not divested, where on refusal of one of the purchasers to accept the corn the seller made settlement with the purchaser refusing to accept, drew a draft for a less amount, and paid the bank the difference, it being understood, in event the drafts were not paid, the seller should reimburse the bank, hence a creditor of the seller could not attach the fund in the hands of the bank.—Farmers' Exchange Bank v. Greil Bros. Co., 84 So. 427, 17 Ala.App. 287, certiorari denied Ex parte Greil Bros. Co., 84 So. 924, 203 Ala. 698.

Sale by shippers after attachment

That a transaction between shippers of hay, dealers therein, and a bank, by their transfer of bill of lading with attached draft to it, and giving of credit by it and drawing thereon by them, did not pass title to it, is not conclusively shown by the fact that after it had claimed the hay, and given bond therefor, against attachment by the shippers' creditor, it sold it through them.—Officer v. F. & M. Nat. Bank of Hobart, Tex.Civ.App., 230 S.W. 226.

Purchase with notice

A purchaser of the goods, with notice of the rights of the bank to which the bill of lading is transferred, who pays the draft cannot attach the fund in the hands of the bank as property of the seller.—Sturgeon Bay Bank v. McLaughlin, 63 Pa.Super. 588.

Evidence of rights of transferee

(1) The fact that a draft was drawn by the shipper in favor of the bank and attached to a shipper's order bill of lading is enough to show the bank to be the owner of the funds.—West Texas Nat. Bank v. Wichita Mill & Elevator Co., Tex.Civ.App., 194 S.W. 835.

(2) Where a shipper's order bill of lading was indorsed by a holder and attached to a draft drawn by the shipper in favor of a bank and proceeds collected, evidence held not to sustain findings that funds belonged to the shipper, that the holder had possession of draft and bill of lading without knowledge of the shipper, indorsed his name without his knowledge, and that credit of account of holder with amount of draft was without the knowledge of the shipper, and that bank knew all these things.—West Texas Nat. Bank v. Wichita Mill & Elevator Co., supra.

(3) On trial of bank's claim to automobile attached by plaintiff in his action against motor car company evidence as to whether car in question was covered by bank's bill of lading held insufficient to support verdict for plaintiff.—Commercial Bank of Port Huron v. Elliott, 159 P. 377, 92 Wash. 357.

Question for jury

On trial to determine whether plaintiff in an action or a bank which claimed to own the automobile attached by him was the owner of the car, question whether the car attached was covered by the bill of lading held by the bank, being a question of fact, was for the jury.—Commercial Bank of Port Huron v. Ownership of bill

(1) Creditors of a consignee could not attach goods as property of the consignee where a bank had agreed in advance to furnish the price of the goods and take the bills of lading as security, as the bank became the owner of the bills as soon as issued on delivery to the carrier.—Kinsolving v. State Savings & Trust Co., 190 S.W. 379, 195 Mo.App. 326.

(2) Where seller of lumber retained bills of lading to keep title until paid by bank, and bills were sent to second bank, pursuant to agreement to pay for lumber and take bills, when title passed from buyer to seller, it passed to second bank by virtue of bill, and lumber could not be attached as property of buyer.—Kinsolving v. State Savings & Trust Co., supra.

that the draft would be paid.[11] The rule also applies whether the party purchased or was merely a pledgee of the draft,[12] but does not apply if the transferee is merely an agent for collection.[13]

The provision of the Bills of Lading Act requiring the transferee of a straight bill of lading to notify the carrier of the transfer to preserve his rights against attachment or garnishment applies to goods in the custody of the carrier but not to purchase money owing by the consignee after delivery.[14] A transferee of a straight bill of lading, who fails to notify the carrier of the transfer, as required by statute, until after the goods have been attached acquires no right to the shipment or its proceeds as against the attaching creditor, even though he has paid the draft accompanying the bill of lading.[15]

As against consignee. The rule that the right of one discounting a draft with a bill of lading attached is superior to attaching creditors applies where a consignee, having paid the draft, seeks to attach the proceeds as a creditor of the consignor[16] or because of defective quality or quantity of the goods not discovered until after the draft was paid.[17] However, the proceeds of the draft may be attached by the consignee where the bank discounting the draft was not a bona fide purchaser[18] or where the bank is regarded as liable for breach of warranty of the seller.[19]

Title revesting in seller. As against levying creditors, the property is that of the seller when, on refusal of the buyer to accept the goods, the seller

Bank as agent, not purchaser
Where a bank discounts a draft with bill of lading attached, and places the amount less the discount to the credit of the drawer, with the right to check on it, and reserves the right to charge back the amount if the draft is not paid, by express agreement or one implied in the course of dealing, and not by reason of liability on indorsement of the draft, the bank is an agent for collection, and not a purchaser so that funds in its hands may be attached by the buyer on breach of contract by the seller—Temple v. La Berge, 114 S E 166, 184 N.C. 252.

Question for jury
(1) Whether a bank claiming ownership of the proceeds of a draft attached to a bill of lading was a purchaser for value of the draft, or a mere collecting agent for the consignor, depended on the intention of the parties, and was a question of fact for the jury, where the evidence was conflicting.—Sterling Mills v. Saginaw Milling Co., 114 S E 756, 184 N.C 461.

(2) In an action against the consignor of goods under a bill of lading with draft attached, where the testimony of the cashier of an intervening bank claiming ownership of the draft is equivocal, if not contradictory, it is error for the court to charge the jury that, if they believed the testimony, they should answer the issue of ownership in the negative—Sterling Mills v. Agent for collection
One of the banks through which there was forwarded for collection a draft, drawn by seller of cotton on buyer for price, attached to order bill of lading, although giving its forwarding correspondent a credit for the amount of the draft, to be charged back, however, to such correspondent if draft was not paid, was not a bona fide purchaser for value of the bill, within federal Uniform Bills of Lading Act, U S.Comp St. §§ 8604aaa–8604w, so as to prevent proceeds of draft, after its payment by buyer of cotton, being attached by him on rescinding for defect in quality of cotton.—Liberty Central Trust Co of St Louis, Mo., v. Senton, 104 So 157, 138 Miss 683.

Effect of indorsement
The status and rights of the parties in interest could not be changed by a bank through which there was forwarded for collection a draft for price of goods, attached to order bill of lading, indorsing on draft that such bank does not guarantee quality of goods covered by bill of lading—Liberty Central Trust Co. of St Louis, Mo., v. Senton, 104 So 157, 138 Miss 683.

Attachment of proceeds of different drafts
(1) Where a bank at two different times took assignments of drafts with bills of lading attached for two different shipments of corn sold to the same buyer by the same seller, the bank was a cowarrantor in both transactions, and the amount received upon the second draft could be attached by the buyer in an action for breach of warranty as to the soundness and merchantability of the corn first shipped—L. Marks' Sons v. West Tennessee Grain Co., 81 So. 162, 119 Miss. 465.

(2) A bank which purchases a draft for the price of a shipment of goods, drawn by seller and consignor on buyer and consignee of goods, occupies, as to the consignee, the situation of the consignor only as to that shipment, so that although bank be not a bona fide holder for value of the draft, the consignee after paying it could recover no part of its proceeds, as against the bank, for losses from defects in goods in shipments prior to that covered by the draft.—Colonial Lumber Co. v. Andelusia Nat. Bank, 103 So. 343, 138 Miss. 566.

gives his check for the amount of the draft to the purchaser of the bill of lading with draft attached.[20]

(2) Transfer of Contract

Transfer of a bill of lading is not a transfer of the contract of carriage or of sale but only of the goods described therein; but the transferee may take all the rights of the transferor under the bill.

The transfer of the bill of lading is not a transfer of the contract of carriage, but only a transfer of the goods represented by it,[21] nor is it an assignment of the contract of sale.[22] It involves no promise on the part of the indorser to do anything toward forwarding the property to its destination and devolves no duty whatever on such indorser. If the instrument is fictitious, or if there is any fraud practiced in transferring it, any remedy that the transferee would be entitled to would be for that special wrong, and not by importing into the indorsement a promise to perform what the carrier had agreed, or purported to have agreed, to do.[23] As a contract with the carrier a bill of lading is a chose in action and as such is not assignable at common law,[24] but, as shown in the title Assignments § 5, now substantially all choses in action are assignable, and transfer of a bill of lading has been held to give to the transferee all the rights under the bill which the transferor had.[25] Transfer of the bill of lading and invoice by the seller to the holder of his note, to enable the holder to receive the purchase price, is an absolute transfer of the account and the seller has no contingent interest in it.[26]

Warranty of goods. A purchaser of a draft with bill of lading attached being to all intents and purposes the owner of the merchandise represented by the bill, he may sue the shipper on his warranty that the goods are merchantable and fit for the purpose for which they are intended.[27]

e. Limitations on Negotiability

Bills of lading are negotiable only in the sense that transfer of the bill of lading passes to the transferee such right or title as the transferor has to the goods therein described.

Under the rule as stated in Corpus Juris, volume 10 p 205 § 271, which has been judicially approved,[28] the view generally held is that "negotiability," as that term is applied to bills of lading, means nothing more than that the transfer of the bill of lading passes to the transferee only such right or title as the transferor had to the goods therein described,[29] and that the rights arising out of the Contract between carrier and indorsee

Indorsements of bills of lading created a contract between carrier and indorsee which could be surrendered for substituted contract without creating any liability by carrier to indorser or changing any existing contract between indorser and indorsee—Feeders Supply Co. v. Union Pac. R. Co., Mo.App., 96 S.W. 2d 1056.

The rights of the transferee and the carrier cannot be affected by any outside understanding between the transferee and the transferor—Feeders Supply Co. v. Union Pac. R. Co., Mo.App., 96 S.W.2d 1056.

Reshipment privilege

(1) Shipper's indorsement of bills of lading did not confer shipper's reshipment privilege on indorsee where shipper had already exercised such privilege—Feeders Supply Co. v. Union Pac. R. Co., Mo.App., 96 S.W.2d 1056.

(3) Holder of negotiable bill of lading was not required, in suit against shipper for damages for breach of warranty in merchandise covered thereby, also to sue party to whom holder's transferor sold the merchandise and bank that guaranteed payment of the draft attached to bill, where he could not have recovered against either—New Iberia Nat. transfer of a bill of lading correspond, not to those arising out of the indorsement of a negotiable promise for the payment of money, but to those arising out of a delivery of the property itself under similar circumstances,[30] and are not to be determined by the application of rules which control the transfer of commercial paper.[31] Likewise it has been denied that bills of lading are negotiable at least in the sense in which the term is applied to commercial paper[32] even when the bill of lading in terms runs to order or assigns.[33] However, bills of lading have been characterized as quasi-negotiable,[34] or as negotiable in a qualified and restricted sense[35] although this limited negotiability may be destroyed by printing across the face of the instrument the words "not negotiable,"[36] or other notation,[37] but, under the express provisions of the federal Uniform Bills of Lading Act any nonnegotiable provision in an order bill is void unless upon its face and in writing agreed to by the shipper.[38]

Where bills of lading are declared negotiable by statute, the words "not negotiable" stamped on a bill of lading do not destroy its assignability[39] nor prevent transfer by indorsement and delivery where any contract is so transferable by statute.[40]

However, it has been said that the Bill of Lading Act manifests a clear intention of congress to make ordinary bills of lading fully negotiable and they are to be considered so as to holders in good faith, unless they carry some of the notices or declarations specified in the act, or others of like import, or some notice or recitation inconsistent with negotiability.—Chicago & N. Statutory provisions

(1) It has been held that statutes which make bills of lading negotiable by indorsement and delivery, in the same manner as bills of exchange and promissory notes, are not intended to change totally their character or to put them on a footing with the character of instruments which are the representatives of money; and that such statutes have no effect other than that of recognizing the power of the owner of a bill of lading to transfer title to the property by means of a transfer of a bill of lading.—Shaw v. North Pennsylvania R. Co., Pa, 101 U.S. 557, 25 L Ed 892—10 C J. p 208 note 1.

(2) On the other hand, the courts of several states have construed statutes containing the same or very similar provisions as making bills of lading negotiable instruments in full without limitations—Thompson v Hibernia Bank & Trust Co., 86 So 652, 148 La. 57—10 C.J. p 208 note 2

(3) It has been held, however, that a state statute making bills of lading conclusive in the hands of bona fide holders for value against the person or corporation issuing them that the property described therein was received by the carrier is abrogated as far as interstate shipments are concerned by the Carmack amendment which covers the subject of bills of lading as to interstate shipments—Southern R Co. v North State Cotton Co., 64 So 965, 107 Miss. 71—10 C J. p 209 note 3.

Blank or special indorsement

Indorsement in blank of a bill of lading merely transfers the right held by the transferor in the property mentioned in the bill, and an indorsement restricted to a particular person or bank transfers such rights as the indorser held in such property to his transferee, but does not constitute a guaranty of the quantity or quality of the goods, the fact that they exist, or the genuineness of the bill of lading.—Tradesmen's State Bank v. Ft. Worth Elevators Co., Tex Civ.App., 214 S.W. 656.

Negotiability not absolute

(1) A bill of lading is evidence of ownership in the hands of the holder, but it is not a negotiable instrument, and does not preclude inquiry into the circumstances under which it is transferred or surrendered—Omaha Elevator Co v Chicago, B & Q. R. Co, 178 N.W. 211, 104 Neb 566.

(2) A straight bill of lading not marked nonnegotiable or not negotiable stands for the goods, but is not, like a bill of exchange or a promissory note, absolute in its negotiability, but remains always subject to have the equities of its transfer revealed by evidence and its potentiality as between them depends on the parties' intention—Swift v. Davis, 193 N.Y S 848, 118 Misc. 205.

Effect of statute

The rule of the text has been held applicable under statutes which declare bills of lading to be negotiable, unless provided in express terms to the contrary on the face thereof.—Barnum Grain Co. v. Great Northern R Co, 112 N W 1030, 1049, 102 Minn. 147—10 C.J. p 206 note 70.

f. Bona Fide Purchasers

(1) Who are bona fide purchasers
(2) Rights of purchasers
(3) Rights as against carrier

(1) Who Are Bona Fide Purchasers

A transferee of a bill of lading who, without knowledge sufficient to put him on inquiry, and without bad faith, takes the bill in the usual course of business is a bona fide purchaser.

The transferee of a bill of lading who takes it in the usual course of business becomes, in the absence of bad faith, a bona fide purchaser.[42] One taking a bill of lading with knowledge of facts or with knowledge sufficient to put him on inquiry cannot claim to be a bona fide holder.[43] One who seeks Tex.—Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Clement Grain Co., Civ. App., 206 S.W. 126, rehearing denied 211 S.W. 347.

Bill as security for loans or advances

One who takes a bill of lading as security for advances to the consignor with the understanding that the proceeds are to be applied to the consignor's debt, and who has no knowledge that the carrier has delivered the goods without production or surrender of the bill of lading, is a bona fide purchaser.—Alderman Bros. Co. v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 129 A. 47, 102 Conn. 461.

Bill with draft attached

(1) Upon acceptance of a draft with a shipper's order bill of lading attached indorsed in blank, the acceptor becomes a holder in due course.—Merchants' State Bank of Centralia v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 245 Ill.App. 211.

(2) A bank discounting a draft with bill of lading attached may become a bona fide holder.—Fourth Nat. Bank of Montgomery, Ala., v. Bragg, 102 S.E. 649, 127 Va. 47, 11 A.L.R. 1034

(3) A bank which merely gives credit for the draft and bill of lading, subject to cancellation if the draft is not paid, is not a bona fide purchaser.—First Nat. Bank v. Stengel, 169 N.Y.S. 217.

(4) Where bank, payee of drafts with bill of lading attached, upon receiving drafts gave the drawer unconditional credit on its books for the amount of the drafts, the bank was owner and holder of the drafts, and not merely the drawer's collecting agent, although it might have applied amount upon drawer's preexisting debt, or upon nonpayment might have claimed right to charge amount back against drawer.—Howe Grain & Mercantile Co. v. A. B. Crouch Grain Co., 211 S.W. 946, error refused.

(5) Where a purchaser of cars of wheat on track procured shipper's orders bills of lading to himself as consignor and consignee, and deposited drafts for the price of the wheat with bills of lading attached in bank and received credit therefor subject to check, the bank was a bona fide holder of such bills of lading and drafts unless in receiving such paper it acted in bad faith.—Burdg v. Scott, 208 P. 668, 111 Kan. 610.

(6) Where a bank, which claimed title to proceeds of draft attached by plaintiff, showed that the draft with bill of lading attached was duly executed and in its possession payable to its order, there was a presumption that it was a holder in due course under Comp.St. § 3040.—Mangum v. Mutual Grain Co., 114 S.E. 2, 184 N.C. 181.

Consideration

The application by a bank of the proceeds of the sale of property covered by a bill of lading to a previous indebtedness of an indorser of the bill of lading is sufficient consideration for the indorsement to the bank to make it a holder for value.—Thompson v. Hibernia Bank & Trust Co., 86 So. 652, 148 La. 57.

Violation by shipper of agreement with buyer

Where a bank is the holder of an order bill of lading transferred to it by the shipper without knowledge of his agreement with the buyer, who paid cash for the goods, to ship them by straight bills of lading the bank is entitled to the property as against the buyer.—National Bank of the Republic v. Hines, 192 P. 899, 112 Wash. 352.

W.Va.—Richlands Brick Corp. v. Hurst Hardware Co., 92 S.E. 685, 80 W.Va. 476

Alteration of bill

Where, after delivery was made by a carrier without surrender of the bills of lading, which prohibited alterations except by indorsement signed by carrier's agent, the dates thereof were changed by the holder from 1909 to April, 1910, by covering the date spaces with cancellation marks, and new-dating them, but not in the natural place therefor, a bank loaning money thereon was put on inquiry, or guilty of negligence, and called on to challenge the same.—Saugerties Bank v. Delaware & Hudson Co., 198 N.Y.S. 722, 204 App.Div. 211, affirmed 141 N.E. 904, 236 N.Y. 425, and reargument denied 142 N.E. 331, 236 N.Y. 675

Bill with draft attached

(1) The fact that indorser of bills of lading with drafts attached was a regular customer of bank and had been frequently overdrawn for some time, and that the bank knew or had reason to believe that he was insolvent, would not make the bank guilty of bad faith in accepting such paper.—Burdg v. Scott, 208 P. 668, 111 Kan. 610

(2) Fact that a bank acts as agent for the collection of a draft with bill of lading for grain attached, and not as purchaser thereof, will not relieve it from liability to the owner of the grain by reason of a restrictive notation appearing on the face of the bill of lading, where the bank is chargeable with knowledge that its principal is without authority to negotiate it.—Standard Grain Co. v. State Bank of Omaha, 182 N.W. 507, 106 Neb. 73.

(3) Where bank surrendered bill of lading on acceptance of draft before arrival of car and then took assignment of bill of lading, "good faith" of bank could be impugned only upon showing that it acted with notice of facts making transaction wrongful.—New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 134 A. 223, 105 Conn. 33.

(4) Knowledge that property had been secured from the carrier without surrender of the bill, by means of an indemnity bond, does not show bad faith by bank in paying draft attached to bills of lading.—Kansas State Bank v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 251 P. 188, 122 Kan. 77.

to claim as a bona fide purchaser must show that the indorsement of the bill was valid.[44]

(2) Rights of Purchasers
- (a) In general
- (b) Transfer by apparent owner

(a) In General

Ordinarily a transfer of a bill of lading by one having neither title to the goods or authority to transfer them gives to a bona fide purchaser no greater title to the goods than his transferor had.

Since the transfer of a bill of lading by the person in possession of the instrument can give no higher title to the property than would the transfer of the property itself by the same person, the general rule is that the holder of a bill of lading, in the absence of either title to the goods or authority to transfer them, cannot by a transfer of the instruments pass the right of property in the goods even to a bona fide purchaser for value.[45] The transferee's rights are not greater than the rights which he would have acquired by delivery to him of the property itself instead of the delivery of the bill of lading representing the property.[46]

Fraudulent or forged bills. It follows that if the bill of lading is fictitious, that is, if it does not represent any goods, then the transferee thereof acquires no rights under the transfer.[47] In the ab-

(5) Where bank, under agreement to back customer in purchase of oil, took his note and placed amount to his credit, under agreement that it was not to be checked against, but did pay checks therefrom, and subsequently accepted drafts and bills of lading for oil which it credited to customer, and, after refusing payment of customer's check in payment of the oil, credited proceeds of drafts to customer's indebtedness, it was not innocent purchaser of bills of lading for value, without notice of seller's title, and having both actual and constructive notice that the check was given for such oil, was bound to know that, if it refused payment, seller could reclaim bills of lading —Lewis v. James McMahon & Co, 271 S.W. 779, 307 Mo. 552

(6) A shipper who, having sold a bill of lading with draft attached to a bank, takes them back knowing the bank has delivered the bill without payment of the draft, that the carrier delivered the goods without requiring surrender of the bill, and that the buyers refused the goods and returned the bill, is not a bona fide purchaser —Pere Marquette Ry. Co. v. J. F. French & Co., 41 S.Ct 195, 254 U.S. 538, 65 L.Ed. 391, reversing J. F. French & Co. v. Pere Marquette Ry. Co, 171 N.W. 491, 204 Mich. 578.

Knowledge of other transactions

In action for carrier's diversion of grain shipment upon which plaintiffs held bills of lading, defense that from knowledge of other transactions plaintiffs should not have relied on bills was without merit.—Knight v. Delaware & Hudson Co, 165 N.Y.S. 583, 178 App.Div. 518.

Notice of reservation of title

A bill of lading for a car of grain, stamped on its face, "Receipt issued for this bill of lading under rules of Omaha Grain Exchange," charged a transferee, who was a member of the exchange, with notice that, as provided in such rules, title to the grain remained in the holder of the receipt until he was paid therefor.

Shipper

Neither a shipper who takes out a bill of lading in his own name nor his assignee is a bona fide purchaser for value, within the meaning of the statute providing that the carrier is liable to a bona fide purchaser of the bill for value who acquires title to the bill, either after or before the carrier delivers the goods without requiring surrender of the bill —Miller v New York Cent R R, 200 N.Y.S. 287, 205 App.Div. 663.

"Bills of exchange and promissory notes are representatives of money, circulating in the commercial world as such, and it is essential to enable them to perform the particular functions that he who purchases them should not be bound to look beyond the instrument, and that his right to enforce them should not be defeated by anything short of bad faith on his part. But bills of lading answer a different purpose and perform different functions. They are regarded as so much cotton, grain, iron, or other articles of merchandise, in that they are symbols of ownership of the goods they cover."—New York Cent & H. R. R Co. v. Bank of Holly Springs, supra.

The rule stated in Corpus Juris has been applied in determining the rights of an assignee of bills of lading retaining proceeds of sale of potatoes as against assignor's tenant in common entitled to proceeds—Daves v. Lufkin, 131 So. 438, 222 Ala. 171

Transfer by bailee

Warehouse to which beans were delivered for processing and storing could not, by shipping some of the goods to a subsidiary of it and drawing a draft on another and attaching to the draft the negotiable bill of lading covering the shipment, convey title through bill of lading to one discounting the draft.—Kendall Produce Co. v. Terminal Warehouse & Transfer Co., 145 A. 511, 295 Pa. 450.

Transferee not bona fide purchaser

Where cotton was not sold absolutely to debtor, who transferred bill of lading to bank, such property was not subject to bank's lien where bank was not a bona fide purchaser —People's Bank & Trust Co. v. Walthall, 75 So. 570, 200 Ala. 122.

Void additional bill

Where agents of a shipper induced agents of the carrier without authority to issue additional bills of lading for an interstate shipment, promising to surrender the original, such bills of lading were void and of no effect, even in the hands of an innocent holder, to whom they were indorsed, for such holder acquired only the title of the transferor—Pioneer Trust Co v Missouri Pac R. Co, 224 S.W. 106, 204 Mo.App 289

sence of contrary statutory provisions, where the carrier receives no goods, and the bill of lading is fraudulently issued by the agent, then the bill of lading represents nothing, and its transfer confers no rights on the transferee as to the goods which it appears to represent.[48]

A drawee of drafts with forged bills of lading attached cannot, on discovering the fictitious character of the bills, recover back what he has paid to the payee, where the payee was an innocent purchaser for value of the drafts.[49]

Other applications of rule. The rule that the transfer of a bill of lading gives to the transferee only such title to the property as the transfer of the property itself by the transferor would have given has been applied to innocent purchasers of lost or stolen bills,[50] bills of lading issued by the carrier to a person without title to the goods,[51] bills of lading obtained from their owner by fraud and then sold,[52] bills sold by an agent of the owner acting in excess of his authority,[53] and to the case of a "spent bill."[54]

Title to bill of lading. A bona fide holder of a negotiable bill of lading takes title to it free from any defect or flaw in the title of prior parties, or defenses available as between them.[55]

(b) Transfer by Apparent Owner

aa. In general

bb. Transfer by fraudulent vendee

aa. In General

A bona fide purchaser from one who has been given the apparent right of property as owner, or of disposal as agent, by the owner of the goods, obtains title to the goods. Lenders of money on security of the bill may be protected.

The general rule, like the rule ordinarily governing the sale of personal property, is subject to certain exceptions and limitations. Thus an exception to the rule obtains where the owner of the goods, by his own misconduct or voluntary act, confers on the person from whom the bona fide purchaser obtained his title the apparent right of property as owner, or of disposal as agent.[56] The true owner of property may, by placing it in the power of another to defraud innocent parties, cut himself off from claiming it and thereby divest the title from himself.[57]

By consignee invested with apparent ownership. A further exception to the rule arises in the case of the transfer of a bill of lading to a bona fide purchaser, for value, by a consignee to whom the goods are, by the terms of the instrument, made deliverable, or to whom the consignor and the original owner of the goods have indorsed and delivered the bill. Under these circumstances the transfer defeats the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu[58] and passes the title to the bona fide transferee.[59] However, the transferor must have been in the lawful possession of the bill of lading, so as to be in a situation to transfer the instrument itself—the

Payee not guarantor

(1) Where drawer in transferring drafts to payee bank assigned bills of lading purporting to be issued to drawer, bank, in forwarding drafts, with attached bills of lading, to drawee, was not a guarantor of signatures attached to bills of lading.—Howe Grain & Mercantile Co. v. A. B. Crouch Grain Co., Tex.Civ.App., 211 S.W. 946, error refused.

(2) Drawee, seeking to recover from payee amount paid on drafts before discovery that attached bills of lading were fictitious, has burden of proving that payee, in forwarding drafts with forged bills of lading attached, was so negligent in not detecting forgery as to make it responsible for drawee's loss.—Howe Grain & Mercantile Co. v. A. B. Crouch Grain Co., supra.

symbol of the property transferred [60]

By agent of owner. Under a statute providing that persons intrusted with bills of lading and other documents of title to goods shall have power to make contracts for the sale, disposition, or pledge of the goods, a transfer of the bill by such a person will be binding against the true owner.[61]

Where through the negligence of a shipper a buyer has obtained possession of a bill of lading and secured a loan on it, the shipper is liable to the lender for any loss sustained.[62]

bb. Transfer by Fraudulent Vendee

A bona fide purchaser of a bill of lading from one who has obtained the goods by fraudulent purchase obtains title to the goods as against the original vendee.

A bona fide indorsee of a bill of lading, for value, received from a fraudulent purchaser of the goods, acquires a good title to the goods against the original vendor,[63] provided such indorsee parted with value on faith in the apparent title of the fraudulent purchaser and his right to dispose of the property,[64] and provided the relation of vendor and purchaser existed between the owner of the goods and the transferor.[65]

(3) Rights as against Carrier

A bona fide purchaser may, in a proper case, hold the carrier liable for issuing a fictitious bill, or a bill misdescribing the goods as to quantity or quality.

A carrier who is negligent in issuing a bill of lading may be liable to one injured by such negligence.[66] To protect bona fide purchasers it is provided in some states by statute that no bill of lading shall be issued unless the goods named therein have been actually delivered to the carrier, making the carrier liable to anyone injured by the issuance of a fraudulent or fictitious bill of lading;[67] and it has been held that the carrier's liability under statutes of this character to one to whom bills of lading have been negotiated for issuing the same before it has received the freight is not changed by a subsequent receipt thereof, the goods having been spoiled before their receipt.[68] Nevertheless statutes of the character under consideration do not operate to make the carrier liable for bills of lading issued by an agent who had no authority to issue bills of lading.[69] As shown in § 141, a carrier is liable to a purchaser of a bill of lading issued by an authorized agent.

As the federal Bills of Lading Act imposes liability on the carrier to a bona fide holder for value when the goods are not as described in the bill[70] an innocent purchaser, suffering damage because of such misdescription, may, as to a shipment within its terms, hold the carrier liable for his loss.[71] He cannot, however, hold the carrier liable for goods other than those actually received by it where the bill on its face shows the carrier is not representing the quality or quantity of the goods.[72] An inno-

Effect of shipper's loading

A carrier may be liable to holder in good faith of order bill of lading covering car of wheat for damages caused by carrier's nonreceipt of part of the goods, in view of Bill of Lading Act Aug. 29, 1916, §§ 20, 22, notwithstanding wheat was loaded by shipper, and that bill of lading recited that weight was "subject to correction," such words not being of "like purport" to the words "shipper's weight, load, and count," or "shipper's weight," or that weight of wheat was "said to be" weight recited in bill of lading, within § 21, prescribing what descriptions in bill of lading shall not render carrier liable.—Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Bewsher, C.C.A.Neb., 6 F.2d 947, certiorari denied 46 S.Ct. 205, 270 U.S. 641, 70 L.Ed. 775.

cent purchaser has no right of action against a carrier for misdating an order bill, as the date is no part of the description of the goods.[73]

Where plaintiff in fact purchased the property, and not the bill of lading which was a proper bill which did not describe the condition of the property, he cannot recover of the carrier on the ground the bill misrepresented the property and that he was an innocent purchaser.[74]

The assignee of an intra-state bill of lading has been held presumed to have acquired it with knowledge that the goods may not be as described.[75]

Rights against carrier for delay. Where a connecting carrier issues a bill of lading in exchange for the initial bill of lading, but at the time the goods are not in its possession, it is liable to a bona fide purchaser of the bill where by reason of delay in delivery of the goods to the connecting carrier the goods are spoiled,[76] and in such case the connecting carrier cannot assert the interstate character of the shipment when the bill erroneously indicated it to be intra-state.[77]

g. Warranties Arising Out of Transfer

(1) In general
(2) Warranties by mortgagee or pledgee receiving payment

(1) In General

Under the federal Bills of Lading Act the transferor, by indorsement or delivery, warrants the genuineness of the bill.

As the federal Bills of Lading Act provides that the transferor of a bill of lading by indorsement or delivery warrants, among other things, the genuineness of the bill, the indorser of a bill which is not genuine is liable to the person paying for it for the amount paid by him.[78] The transferor for value warrants the genuineness of the bill of lading whether the transfer is by indorsement or delivery.[79]

(2) Warranties by Mortgagee or Pledgee Receiving Payment

As provided by the federal Bills of Lading Act, a mortgagee or pledgee or other person holding a bill of lading as security who in good faith demands or receives payment of the debt does not warrant the genuineness of the bill nor the quantity or quality of the goods.

Under the provision of the federal Bills of Lading Act that a mortgagee or pledgee or other holder of a bill for security who in good faith demands or receives payment of the debt shall not be deemed to represent or warrant the genuineness of the bill nor the quality or quantity of the goods therein described, a pledgee of a bill for security,[80] a bank receiving drafts with bills of lading attached, merely for collection, delivering the bills on payment of the drafts,[81] or a bank, merely discounting or cashing a draft with a bill of lading attached,[82] does not

Reliance on indorsement

(1) One paying drafts is entitled to rely on indorsements on bills of lading attached thereto, indorser's obligations being question of law.—American State Bank of Omaha, Neb., v. Mueller Grain Co., C.C.A.Ill., 15 F.2d 899, certiorari granted Mueller Grain Co. v. American State Bank of Omaha, 46 S.Ct. 633, 271 U.S. 658, 70 L.Ed. 1136, and reversed on other grounds 48 S.Ct. 34, 275 U.S. 493, 72 L.Ed. 390.

(2) Indorsements calling for payment, being on bills of lading which call for no payment, are sufficient to put drawee of drafts on inquiry as to their genuineness.—American State Bank of Omaha, Neb. v. Mueller Grain Co., supra.

Recovery of payment

Money paid by drawee on draft against fictitious indorsed bills of lading, and accepted against such bills, in ignorance of fraud, may be recovered from payee.—First Nat. Bank v. Kempner, 229 P. 840, 103 Okl. 237.

Prior indorsements only guaranteed

(1) A bank's indorsement, "all prior indorsements guaranteed, pay to any bank or banker or order," upon a draft to which forged bills of lading were attached but which contained no reference thereto, implied no guaranty of the genuineness of such bills.—Downing Co. v. Pearson Banking Co., 92 S.E. 968, 20 Ga.App. 242.

(2) The indorsement on the back of a draft by a bank to which it was forwarded for collection, "Pay any bank or banker, all previous indorsements guaranteed," merely guaranteed the genuineness of the prior indorsements, and did not guarantee payment of the draft, nor the existence, quality, or quantity of the wheat mentioned in the accompanying bill of lading.—Tradesmen's State Bank v. Ft. Worth Elevators Co., Tex.Civ.App., 214 S.W. 656 ordinarily warrant the genuineness of the bill nor the quality or quantity of the goods therein described,[83] and incurs no liability for the seller's breach of warranty.[84] The rule is otherwise, however, where the transaction amounts to a purchase of the bill.[85]

h. Delivery for Collection

A transferee for collection of a draft attached to a bill of lading has a lien on the property for advances made, and is liable for failure to follow instructions of the transferor.

Transfer of a bill of lading with draft attached to a bank for collection gives to the bank a lien on the property described in the bill for the money it advances to the shipper.[86] Where drafts with bills of lading attached are delivered to a bank for collection, instructions that the bills are to be surren-

Bank named as consignee

A bank discounting a draft attached to a bill of lading in which it was named as consignee may, by proper indorsement on bill of lading, repudiate any implied warranties otherwise following such indorsement.—Johnston v. Western Maryland Ry. Co., 135 A. 185, 151 Md. 422.

Forged bills

(1) A drawee, who has paid a draft to which forged bills of lading were attached, has no recourse against a bank which has discounted the draft in the ordinary course of business and without knowledge of the fraud.—Downing Co. v. Pearson Banking Co., 92 S.E. 968, 20 Ga.App. 242.

(2) Bank discounting forged bill of lading, in which it was directed to notify J, is bound only to act in good faith toward J, who could not complain that bank did not take all possible precautions for its own protection.—Johnston v. Western Maryland Ry. Co., 135 A. 185, 151 Md. 422.

Consignee waiving right of inspection

A consignee required to pay for goods before delivery is entitled to inspect before receiving and paying therefor, but may waive such rights by paying for and receiving them before inspection, and if he does so he cannot, upon later deciding to reject, require repayment from a bank who is assignee in good faith of a draft for the purchase price with bill of lading attached, the buyer's remedy being action against seller for damages.—Old Nat. Not party to sale

A discounting party does not become a party to the contract of sale.—Williams v. National Fruit Exch., 111 A. 197, 95 Conn. 300.

Refund

(1) A discounting bank is not required because of the seller's breach of warranty to refund the money paid; and it is immaterial that the bank required a guaranty of payment by the drawee before it would discount.—Williams v. National Fruit Exch., 111 A. 197, 95 Conn. 300

(2) A bank which in bad faith discounted a draft with bill of lading attached drawn on a buyer by the seller of grapes, bad but warranted good, is liable for return of the money paid by the buyer on the draft, as holding money which ex æquo et bono ought to be paid over to the buyer and drawee.—Williams v. National Fruit Exch., supra.

Complaint good as against demurrer

Buyer's complaint against bank to which draft with bill of lading attached was allegedly "sold" by transaction which "was not an ordinary discount transaction," alleging that bank had furnished evidence in another connection to establish its absolute ownership of bill of lading and of cocoa beans represented thereby, and that seller had no interest therein, that beans were unfit for human consumption, and that department of agriculture ordered beans destroyed or deported stated cause of action with such reasonable precision as to preclude sustaining of demurrer to complaint without leave to amend.—Bishop & Co. v. Midland Bank, C.C.A.Cal., 84 F.2d 585, certiorari denied Midland Bank v. Bishop & Co., 57 S.Ct. 111, 299 U.S. 587, 81 L.Ed. 432.

86. Old.—First & Old Detroit Nat. Bank v. Holloman, 208 P. 791, 86 Okl. 246.

Right of bank as against creditors

(1) Where a bank advanced to a lumber company eighty per cent of shipping value of lumber shipped by it, taking its notes therefor, and, to secure them, bills of lading and other shipping papers were delivered to bank, which acted as collecting agent upon sale of lumber, it was held that, where company became insolvent and made an assignment for benefit of creditors, bank was entitled to retain such collateral security for unpaid notes.—Page v. U. S. Nat. Bank, 229 P. 375, 112 Or. 391.

(2) Where shipper indorsed draft and transferred the accompanying bill of lading to a bank, and received credit on his account with the bank for the amount of the draft with the understanding that the bank was acting only as the shipper's collecting agent, the property described in bill of lading was not subject to attachment by shipper's creditor prior to payment of draft.—First & Old Detroit Nat. Bank v. Holloman, 208 P. 791, 86 Okl. 246.

dered only on payment of the drafts must be complied with by the collecting bank.[87] If a collecting bank surrenders the bill of lading without collecting the draft it is liable to the drawer for the amount of the draft.[88] A bank receiving a bill of lading with draft for collection is liable to the drawer for damages when it accepts payment of the draft from, and delivers the bill of lading to, someone other than the purchaser of the goods on whom the draft was drawn.[89]

Where it is understood that the bank receiving a bill of lading with draft attached is acting only as a collecting agent, it may charge back to the shipper's account the amount of the draft if not paid.[90] Where the bank charges the seller's account, title to the goods revests in the seller.[91]

§ 129. - Duplicate and Substituted Bills of Lading

Except as it may otherwise be provided by statute, duplicate or triplicate bills of lading are each original bills. A substitute bill of lading may be issued but not to the prejudice of the rights of a transferee or holder of the original.

Apart from the provisions of the Uniform Bills of Lading Act forbidding the issuance of duplicate bills of lading unless so marked, it is not unusual for the carrier to issue duplicate or triplicate bills of lading, each being an original bill for all purposes.[92] When several bills of lading have been

Bank alone liable

Where seller sends bill of lading to bank for delivery on payment by buyer and bank delivers without payment, although buyer is solvent, seller may look to bank alone for his damage —St Louis Carbonating & Mfg Co. v Lookeba State Bank, 157 P. 1046, 59 Okl. 71.

Defenses

Where plaintiff bank forwarded drafts and attached bills of lading to defendant bank for collection, the latter is in no position to deny its liability for the unauthorized surrender by it of a bill of lading without payment of the draft to which it is attached, and in suit for the amount of drafts it cannot object that the drawer, and not plaintiff bank, was the owner and real party in interest —Hibernia Bank & Trust Co v Bank of Topeka, C C.A La., 288 F. 41.

Effect of prior transactions

Where draft with bills of lading attached to "shipper's order notify" bore on its face the printed words, "Attached documents to be surrendered only on payment of draft," defendant bank was required to take notice that authority to surrender the bills of lading before payment of the draft was expressly withheld, notwithstanding prior transactions, in which plaintiff bank had permitted the bills of lading to be delivered prior to the payment of the drafts —Hibernia Bank & Trust Co v Bank of Topeka, C C A La, 288 F 41.

Liability of collecting bank to discounting bank

(1) Bank, which delivered bill of lading without requiring payment of draft, to which it was attached in violation of instructions of the discounting bank, who was the owner of bill of lading, was guilty of conversion of the bill of lading and the goods of which the bill of lading was the symbol —Market State Bank v Farmers' Sav Bank of Meservey, 181 N W. 486, 190 Iowa 1112.

(2) Where seller negotiated sight draft and bill of lading to a bank, and the bank forwarded the sight draft and a delivery order to other bank, and the other bank, on buyer's payment of the freight, turned the delivery order over to the buyer to enable buyer to inspect the goods, without payment by buyer of the sight draft, and the buyer on inspection refused to accept the goods, the second bank was not liable to the first bank on the theory that it was negligent in surrendering delivery order to buyer without payment of sight draft, since the first bank suffered no damages, the buyer not obtaining title to, nor converting, the goods.—First Nat. Bank v Farmers' Sav Bank of Traer, Iowa, 193 N.W 573, 195 Iowa 1260

Damages for wrongful delivery

Where a bank had delivered bill of lading without requiring payment of draft to which the bill of lading was attached contrary to instructions of owner of the bill, the owner's measure of damages in an action for conversion was the market value of the goods at the place to which they had been shipped in excess of the freight charges which would have to be paid before they could be disposed of — Market State Bank v Farmers' Sav. Bank of Meservey, 181 N W. 486, 190 Iowa 1112

Evidence

In an action against defendant bank for the amount of drafts, where defendant delivered bills of lading without payment of drafts, evidence that the agent of the drawer and consignor was not authorized by either the drawer or the payee of the drafts to consent to surrender of the bills of lading without payment of the drafts, is consistent with a finding that defendant bank's act in surrendering the bills of lading was unauthorized and wrongful —Hibernia Bank & Trust Co v. Bank of Topeka, C C.A La., 288 F 41.

Amount

(1) Where seller consigning goods sent bill of lading to bank with directions to deliver goods on cash payment and execution of notes, and bank delivered goods without collecting the cash or requiring notes, its liability is not lessened by sum offered by buyer less than amount due. —St Louis Carbonating & Mfg Co. v Lookeba State Bank, 157 P. 1046, 59 Okl. 71.

(2) Where seller sent bill of lading to bank for delivery on payment by buyer, bank's liability on delivery without payment is lessened by amount of valid claim of buyer against seller for damage —St. Louis Carbonating & Mfg. Co v. Lookeba State Bank, supra.

signed, the person who first gets one of them by a legal title from the owner or the shipper has a right to the consignment.[93] If one of the duplicate bills of lading as representing the goods is transferred to a holder, he can recover them, although the consignor retaining the other bill has ordered the carrier to return the goods;[94] but, of course, if the duplicate is issued without the carrier's authority he will not be bound thereby.[95] If issued with authority, the carrier will be liable to the holder of either, although the shipper who has received them fraudulently transfers both as originals.[96] In case of a variance between the duplicates, that one will be binding which is acted on as representing the contract or the goods.[97]

When a carrier by mistake issues two bills of lading and the consignee has made advances on the duplicate bill, he may recover them from the carrier.[98] Where, however, the shipper induced the carrier's agent to issue a second bill of lading for an interstate shipment, promising to surrender the first, which had already been negotiated to plaintiff, and the shipment was diverted to the point of destination specified in the second bill of lading, which with draft attached was also negotiated to plaintiff, it was held, where plaintiff collected the draft attached to the second bill, that he could recover from the carrier only the damages sustained by reason of the failure to deliver the shipment at the destination mentioned in the first bill of lading; therefore, the amount received from the collection of the draft attached to the second must be deducted.[99]

Substituted bills of lading. So long as the bill of lading representing the goods is in the hands of the person to whom it was originally issued, there can of course be no objection to the substitution of another bill by agreement of the parties; but after it has passed from the person to whom issued into the hands of another, it will work a fraud for the carrier to issue a substituted bill of lading which may be used by the person to whom it is issued in making a pretended sale or pledge of the property for which it stands, and in such a case, although the carrier has honored the second bill of lading, it will be responsible to a bona fide holder of the first bill for the goods.[1] Where the seller for cash delivers bills of lading, receiving the buyer's check, if the check is not paid the seller has title and the right to possession of substituted bills of lading issued to the buyer after he obtained the original bills.[2] The issuance of a second bill of lading without surrender of the original bill has been held void as permitting a discrimination.[3]

A memorandum copy of a bill of lading is not a duplicate bill of lading within a stamp tax statute requiring a stamp to be affixed to duplicate bills of lading.[4]

§ 130. Special Contracts for Transportation

While special contracts between a shipper and a carrier, when valid, will control and determine the rights and liabilities of the parties, they must not be illegal, discriminatory, or violative of the carrier's public duties.

Where there is a special contract between the shipper and the carrier, the terms of such contract, so far as it is valid, will determine the rights and liabilities of the parties,[5] unless fraudulently pro-

Issuance prohibited by rule of carrier

(1) Where the rules of a carrier providing for diversion of shipment required the original bill of lading to be surrendered before a new one could be issued, a bill of lading, issued without surrender of the original, is void, even though issued with the authority of the carrier, for a contrary holding would permit a discrimination in violation of the Interstate Commerce Act, U.S.Comp.St. § 8597, and hence such a bill of lading is of no force even in the hands of a bona fide holder, where issued prior to the Pomerene Bill of Lading Act, U.S.Comp.St. §§ 8604a–8604w, making such bills negotiable.—Pioneer Trust Co. v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co., 224 S.W. 109, 204 Mo.App. 328.

(2) Where a second bill of lading issued for an interstate shipment without surrender of the original was void because issued contrary to the rules of the carrier, the carrier cannot be held liable thereon, even by an innocent purchaser, on theory of estoppel, for that would tend to permit discrimination.—Pioneer Trust Co. v. Nashville, supra.

As against principles applicable, in absence of agreement

Where there is an express contract between the shipper and the carrier, the terms thereof control since an express agreement will prevail

cured by the carrier.[6]

Limitations on right to make special contracts. A carrier cannot enter into a contract which will disable it from performing its duties to the public[7] or in any way interfere with its statutory and common-law duties toward shippers.[8]

However, subject to this rule, special contracts which are not unjust, unreasonable, or discriminatory are not per se void.[9] On the other hand, any special contract resulting in discrimination or a violation of statute is, as shown in §§ 392–397, void. Under the Carmack amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act, requiring the carrier in interstate commerce to issue a bill of lading the terms of which are fixed by the interstate commerce commission, a carrier has no authority to enter into any other than the uniform contract,[10] although the Cummins amendment of the Carmack amendment, not being retroactive, does not affect stipulations in a contract where the shipment and the cause of action occurred before its enactment.[11]

Contracts must not be in derogation of the regulatory laws applicable to carriers,[12] and must be made according to the law and the rate schedules filed with the interstate commerce commission whenever these apply.[13] Contracts of carriers of freight for services not provided for in their tariffs cannot be enforced.[14]

Consideration and assent. Special contracts must be supported by a consideration.[15]

The fact that the shipper executed the contract hurriedly or without due care,[16] or that he did not read the contract if it is in writing, or that he did not fully comprehend its terms, is immaterial; he is none the less bound by its terms.[17]

Form and contents. Except as otherwise required by statute the contract may be in parol; a bill of lading is not the only evidence of the terms of a special contract.[18] However, as shown in § 131, the against a general principle applicable in the absence of such an agreement.—Gruenwald v. American Ry. Express Co., 217 N.Y.S. 767, 128 Misc. 206.

Goods carrier not bound to accept

A carrier may by special contract accept for carriage certain goods which it is not bound to accept pursuant to its duty as a common carrier.—Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Herring, 174 So. 502, 234 Ala. 238.

Stopping and holding liquor shipment

Owner of beer being transported through Georgia, where it was then contraband, by common carrier in interstate commerce, could not have shipment stopped and held in Georgia until further instructions, or recover for carrier's failure to keep its agreement so to stop and hold shipment, since stoppage and holding of shipment in Georgia would take away interstate character of shipment and agreement was illegal—Davis v. Agreements held supported by consideration

(1) Railway's general reduction of rates is a legal detriment, constituting "valuable consideration" for shipper's promise to locate its terminal on railway, and make all shipments of sand and stone over railway.—East Carolina Ry. v. Ziegler Bros., 157 S.E. 57, 200 N.C. 396.

Agreements held without consideration

(1) Agreement of contractor constructing embarkation facilities for government to pay rental to a railroad for use of engine to move and spot cars is without consideration, and ineffective, where services rendered were those already fully paid for in line haul rate.—Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Westinghouse, Church, Kerr & Co., 123 S.E. 352, 138 Va. 647, certiorari granted 45 S.Ct. 98, 266 U.S. 598, 69 L.Ed. 460, and affirmed 46 S.Ct. 220, 270 U.S. 260, 70 L.Ed. 576

Shipment of live stock

(1) Under the federal law a contract covering an interstate shipment of live stock must be in writing—Bradford v. Hines, 227 S.W. 839, 206 Mo.App. 582—Underwood v. Hines, Mo.App., 222 S.W. 1037—Thee v.

execution of a written contract may supersede a prior oral agreement. A contract for shipment is not necessarily defective because unfilled and incomplete in certain places,[19] and, when signed by the shipper while containing certain blanks, is binding on him, although the blanks are thereafter filled by the carrier's agent.[20] Where, as required by a carrier's published tariffs, notations were made on the contracts of shipment and the waybills as to the places at which live stock was to be fed and watered, such notations became binding on both parties as though incorporated in the contracts as formal stipulations.[21]

Construction. A special contract being phrased in its own language is to be construed strictly against the carrier.[22] Any ambiguity in the terms of a contract prepared by the carrier must be resolved against it,[23] particularly where to do otherwise would be to deprive the shipper of its common-law measure of damages.[24] Two contracts issued on the same day on the one shipment are to be construed together.[25]

Contract personal to shipper. Special agreements by the shipper are personal to him, and third persons have no right to avail themselves of the terms thereof.[26]

§ 131. Modification, Merger, and Rescission of Contract

Written contracts supersede prior oral agreements unless executed. Contracts may be modified by the proper parties, if done in the proper manner.

If a written contract has been entered into, the general rule is well settled that it is conclusive as to the matters covered thereby, and it is not open to either of the parties to say that there was a prior oral agreement inconsistent with the provisions of the writing.[27] However, it is equally well settled that the bill of lading or other written contract will not supersede a prior oral agreement, if the written contract is not entered into until the goods have already been accepted for transportation under the parol agreement,[28] and a bill of lading excluding on its face the idea that it began to operate before a car was furnished as agreed does not affect the rights of the parties accruing prior to the bill,[29] even though providing that it contains the entire bargain between the shipper and the carrier.[30] Thus a prior executory and yet unbroken parol agreement is merged in a subsequent bill of lading containing the contract agreed on;[31] but a parol contract which has already been broken by the carrier will not be merged in a subsequent written contract with reference to the shipment of the same property, so as to defeat a recovery for breach of the parol contract,[32] unless the shipper agrees for a sufficient consideration to waive it,[33] such an agreement if based on a sufficient consideration will be valid, and the written contract will supersede the prior oral contract;[34] but if the bill of lading is one forbidden by law it is void and the status of the parties is the same as if the agreement had never been entered into.[35]

Where a definite contract of shipment has been made between the consignee or the owner and the carrier, this binds both parties as between themselves, and it cannot be varied by any subsequent arrangement or agreement made with the carrier by the consignor or any other person acting in the shipment, unless, of course, such person has authority from the consignee to alter the original contract.[36] To hold otherwise would be to say that one party to a contract might relieve himself from its obligations without the consent or the knowledge of the other merely by making an inconsistent agreement with a third party.[37] A verbal contract to transport in time for market, allegedly supplementing the bill of lading, is not binding where the bill of lading requires merely reasonable dispatch in transportation.[38] Parties to a contract of transportation may in a proper case modify the original agreement by providing for diversion of the goods to a new destination while in transit.[39] Where the shipping contract is completed, a subsequent attempted modification by reconsignment must be made pursuant to the tariff regulations.[40]

Alteration after issue. A bill of lading having been made a part of the shipping agreement, it cannot be modified by the shipper except by written agreement.[41] A statutory provision that any alteration of a bill of lading, after its issue by the carrier, without authority from the carrier either in writing or noted on the bill, shall be void does not apply to a parol agreement between the consignor and the parties to be notified whereby they are made agents of the consignor to receive the goods without producing the bill of lading.[42] A promise by the carrier, after goods have arrived at their destination, to spot the car on a certain track for delivery does not add to or modify the bill of lading.[43] A provision in the bill against alteration does not apply to indorsement for transfer.[44]

§ 132. Excuses for Nonperformance

A carrier may by his contract lose the right to excuses for nonperformance of his duties which might otherwise be available to him.

The common law allows the carrier certain excuses for delay in transportation, infra §§ 197–207, or for failure to deliver, supra § 75 et seq, and the like, but by special agreement the carrier may obligate itself specifically with reference to the time of delivery, the furnishing of cars, and like matters, and if it does so it waives its common-law defenses and is bound as any other contracting party. In such case impossibility of performance will not be an excuse for a failure to carry out the terms of its agreement.[45] As otherwise expressed, "when a party agrees to perform a certain stipulation by a given date, without exception or qualification, he must answer in damages for failure to perform, notwithstanding performance was out of his power;"[46] and the liability being a contractual one, the question of negligence on the part of the carrier is immaterial.[47] Where a private carrier agreed to transport goods safely, the fact that the goods were damaged through the fault of a third person is no excuse.[48]

c. Contracts to furnish cars
d. Other contracts

a. To Transport to Point beyond Line

As shown in § 404 infra, the weight of authority is to the effect that the liability of the first carrier, in the absence of any contract, usage, or statute to the contrary, terminates if it transports the goods to the end of its line for carriage and delivers them to a connecting carrier, to be taken to their destination. Nevertheless, as shown § 405 infra, the carrier may contract for delivery of goods accepted for shipment to a point beyond its own line, and will be liable for loss or injury to the goods occurring after the goods passed into the hands of a connecting carrier. Under the Interstate Commerce Act an initial carrier is liable for any loss, damage, or injury to property, transported in interstate commerce, caused by a connecting carrier, as is discussed in § 406 infra.

b. Special Contracts as to Rates

Except as prohibited by statute, special contracts as to rates will bind the parties.

Questions of discrimination between shippers through special contracts as to rates and statutory prohibitions thereof are considered in §§ 375–385 infra. When contracts for shipment at a specified rate are permitted, and are not otherwise invalid, a contract by which the shipper is given the option to ship at a specified rate, either without limit, or up to a certain quantity, or not less than a certain quantity, binds the carrier if the shipper avails himself of this option.[49] The shipper may bind himself in consideration of a fixed rate to ship via a particular carrier all or a specified proportion of the goods which the shipper shall ship during a given period from a particular place.[50]

Consideration being necessary to support a contract, if the offer is at a certain rate, with the understanding that the shipper shall stipulate in acceptance of the offer the amount of goods to be transported, the mere shipment in response to the offer does not give rise to a contract, as there is no consideration for giving the shipper an option to ship any quantity he pleases.[51] An agreement by a railroad to guarantee a certain rate for an ocean shipment is without consideration where at the time no contract to ship the goods over the railroad had been entered into.[52] Where a written contract to transport an unspecified amount of ore at a specified rate contained no time limit, and hence could be abrogated on reasonable notice, a new agreement to transport at the same rate was sufficient consideration for a new oral contract guaranteeing a minimum tonnage for shipment.[53]

(3) Excuses for nonperformance

(1) In General

Although such agreements are unenforceable where discriminatory or violative of statutory provisions, in other cases a carrier may specially agree to furnish cars at a certain time and place, and be liable for breach of such an agreement.

Contracts to furnish cars for interstate shipments, if violative of the published tariff regulations of the carrier, are, under the Interstate Commerce Act, not enforceable.[54] As to intra-state shipments, special contracts for furnishing cars have been held valid and enforceable[55] in the absence of any prohibitory statute,[56] and it is assumed that the carrier can furnish the cars without discrimination.[57]

When special contracts for furnishing cars are not invalid or prohibited, the carrier may make a binding contract to furnish cars at specified times and places, and will be liable for all damages to the shipper caused by failure or delay in carrying out such contract,[58] and the contract may be by parol as well as in writing,[59] and for interstate as well as intra-state shipments.[60] The contract must be express, for otherwise the proposing shipper has no action, save on a breach of the carrier's general common-law duty to furnish cars within a reasonable time.[61]

One railroad may agree with another railroad for the latter to furnish cars for the use of the former, and that it has done so does not show negligence in failing to furnish cars to a shipper.[62]

(2) Requisites and Sufficiency of Contract and Sufficiency of Performance

The rules of contracts generally determine the requisites and sufficiency of contracts to furnish cars. Sufficiency of compliance depends on the facts of the particular case.

The rules applicable to contracts generally, discussed in the C.J.S. title Contracts §§ 74–131, also 13 C.J. pp 311–369, making consideration and mutuality essential to their validity, apply to contracts of the character under consideration.[63] Whether or not a contract to furnish cars at a particular time and place exists,[64] and whether or not there has

63. Mutuality and consideration

(1) The carrier's promise to furnish cars and the shipper's agreement to route shipments by the carrier's lines are sufficient mutual consideration to support the contract, even if the cars were to be furnished at a point fifty miles from the carrier's lines—Kissell v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W & C Ry Co., 188 S.W. 1118, 194 Mo.App 346.

(2) Where the carrier agreed to furnish cars to the shipper, at his place of business, fifty miles from the carrier's nearest line point, no guaranty of delivery at such place was necessary on which to base liability for failure to deliver at that place—Kissell v Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C Ry Co, supra

(3) It was held that a request by a shipper that a carrier furnish cars at a specified time for the shipment of sheep carries with it an understanding on their part to use the cars, and furnishes a sufficient consideration for the carrier's promise to furnish them at such time—Pope v. Wisconsin Cent R. Co., 127 N.W. 436, 112 Minn 112.

Facts insufficient to show contract

(1) Shipper's letter written before watermelon crop was planted, and railroad's reply promising "necessary arrangements," was held insufficient to constitute valid contract for increasing shipping facilities—McLemore v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co, 154 S E. 390, 199 N C. 264.

(2) It was no acceptance of a railroad's offer to ship live stock from a designated town, so that it would not be under duty by federal statute to unload and water them in transit, to ship the stock from another town on a through bill of lading, containing no stipulation against unloading, issued by another carrier as initial carrier—Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. v. Farrell & Braley, 70 So. 986, 14 Ala App. 380

(3) That defendant express company agreed with plaintiff shipper to have cars ready in time for shipment to go out, so as to connect with a fast passenger train, would not show a special contract for through and direct transportation of the cattle, where such train was not schebeen a sufficient compliance therewith,[65] must be determined by the facts of each particular case and by the application of the ordinary rules governing the interpretation of contracts.

(3) Excuses for Nonperformance

In general the carrier may not be excused from the performance of a special contract to furnish cars except by the waiver, default, or misconduct of the shipper.

Where a carrier enters into a special contract to furnish cars at specified times and places, its liability is absolute and impossibility of performance furnishes no excuse;[66] and this is so whether the other party knew of it or not.[67] Matters not excusing the performance of a special contract to furnish cars, but tending only to excuse performance of the general duties imposed by law, constitute no defense to a breach of the special contract.[68] Irregularity in an application for a car, when waived,[69] accident,[70] or delay resulting from inevitable necessity, does not excuse nonperformance,[71] nor does inability to furnish cars because of unusually heavy traffic,[72] where the shipper is not notified.[73] In an action for breach of a carrier's contract to furnish cars for the shipment of stock, the fact that the shipper did not own or have the stock when the contract was made could not affect the question of the carrier's liability for failure to provide cars.[74] So, it is no defense to an action for breach of a contract by a carrier to furnish cars that plaintiff intended to dispose of the goods at their destination on Sunday.[75] It is also no excuse for nonperformance that the cars which the carrier agreed to furnish belonged to another company which failed to furnish them to the carrier,[76] or that it used reasonable efforts to procure foreign cars;[77] and the fact that the shipment is to be carried over connecting lines will not exonerate the carrier from the consequences of its breach of contract at the point of shipment;[78] nor can the carrier excuse nonperformance by showing that its line of road is under the military control of the federal government.[79] An act of God occurring after breach of the contract does not affect the carrier's liability.[80] As against the obligation to furnish cars at a particular time fixed by contract, it is immaterial that the time allowed for furnishing the cars is not reasonable for that purpose;[81] but the damages for failure to furnish sufficient cars to move a shipper's goods are not recoverable where the goods were never offered or delivered at the place designated by the shipping contract.[82]

duled to stop at a way station, destination of shipment.—Adams Express Co v Burr Oak Jersey Farm, 206 S W 173, 182 Ky. 116.

(4) That a railroad had for a long time always delivered shipments of cattle before a certain hour at a certain market destination, and that it knew that such shipments delivered later could not be sold on the day of receipt, does not prove an agreement to deliver such shipments at such time.—Wood v. Boston & M R. R., 98 A. 480, 78 N H 207.
10 C.J p 213 note 59 [b].

Car furnished by other road

There was no actual or implied contractual relationship between a railroad and one to whom another railroad furnished a car, from which a promise to pay could be implied, where there was nothing to indicate that the car was asked for or accepted from plaintiff, or that defendant was in fact dealing with plaintiff through its agent.—Seaboard Air Line Ry Co. v. Time for furnishing Notwithstanding a shortage of cars, where a carrier expressly agreed to supply cars on designated dates in the future, it must be assumed that the time was reasonably sufficient, or at least was satisfactory to the parties, and the fact, if true, that the time was not a reasonable time to obtain cars is no defense to action for breach of the contract.—Vander Zyl v. Chicago, R I. & P. Ry. Co., 189 N W. 953, 195 Iowa 901, error dismissed Chicago, R I & P. Ry Co. v Vander Zyl, 45 S Ct 10, 266 U S. 636, 69 L Ed 481.

The carrier may be excused where failure to furnish cars as agreed was due to the shipper's fault.[83]

d. Other Contracts

Except as prohibited by statute a shipper and carrier may specially contract as to the time and manner of delivery and other particular matters arising out of their relationship.

Except as prohibited by statute special agreements may be made as to time, place, and manner of delivery,[84] for delivery beyond the point of termination of the carrier's lines,[85] for unloading goods,[86] for shipment by a particular train,[87] for refrigeration of cars,[88] for collection of freight charges from the consignee,[89] for storage,[90] for transportation of corpse and relatives,[91] and for compensation to the shipper in the event of loss or damage to the goods by the carrier.[92] A railroad may validly agree to hire an engine and crew to a manufacturer.[93]

A railroad, to which a car owned by a shipper was delivered under a bill of lading entitling the owner of the car to be paid for the use of it by the railroad on a mileage basis, is a bailee for hire, entitled to use the car under the contract of bailment only in accordance with the bill of lading, and is liable to the owner for breach of contract if the car is otherwise used.[94]

Contract of a carrier with a warehouse, giving it the right to load cars at its plant and procure bills of lading on the faith of its representations as to the quantity of goods loaded, makes the warehouse an agent of the shipper and not the carrier.[95]

A pipe line company, agreeing with a buyer to receive, transport, and load in the buyer's tank cars a certain quantity of oil for a pipeage charge to be paid by the buyer, is a carrier for, and agent of, the buyer, and not of the seller; and if the buyer breaches his contract with the seller by refusing to pay, the seller is released from his obligation to deliver any more oil to the pipe line and is not liable to the pipe line company for so refusing.[96]

When a logging company abandons its attempt to force a grade crossing, and agrees to do so as long as the railroad carries its logs at a certain rate, there is no want of mutuality in the contract.[97]

§ 134. Actions for Breach of Contract

The general rules of civil actions govern actions on contracts between shippers and carriers.

An action may be maintained against the carrier for breach of a special contract,[98] but for a shipper to maintain such an action there must have been privity of contract between the carrier and the shipper.[99] Where orders for cars for the shipment of goods were given by plaintiff and were accepted by the railroad company, there was a contractual relation between the parties, entitling plaintiff to maintain an action for damages for failure to furnish cars according to the orders, even though another was jointly interested with plaintiff in the shipments to be made.[1] A member of a pool has

Construction of contracts as to time of delivery

A carrier contracting to deliver within specified time does not impliedly agree to deliver within reasonable time, and may not set up delivery within reasonable time as defense in action for violation of contract.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Warren County Strawberry Growers' Ass'n, 267 S.W. 551, 206 Ky. 432—10 C.J. p. 215 note 97 [a].

Excuses for noncompliance

Where a contract of carriage contained an absolute and unconditional stipulation requiring the carrier to re-ice the cars at every icing station, the carrier could not excuse noncompliance therewith because its employees in charge did not consider re-icing necessary.—Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Texas Packing Co., Tex.Civ.App., 167 S.W. 337.

Successor to carrier's business

A consignor of a shipment delivered to a carrier which afterward goes out of business and is succeeded by another carrier with whom he has no privity of contract, may not recover against such carrier on the contract of shipment.—American Ry. Express Co. v. Archer, 104 S.E. 92, 25 Ga.App. 647.

1. Mich.—Fremont Canning Co. v. Pere Marquette R. Co., 146 N.W. 678, 180 Mich. 283.

no cause of action for failure to furnish cars under a contract to furnish cars to the manager of the pool itself, under a statute providing that all those parties who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants;[2] nor is he entitled to recover on the theory of breach of duty as a carrier.[3]

Limitations. A claim against a carrier for breach of contract to collect freight charges from the consignee and refund them to the shipper, even if such contract is an illegal discrimination, does not arise out of a "civil wrong," within the meaning of the Interstate Commerce Act requiring suit to be brought before the expiration of two years.[4]

Pleading. As in actions on contracts generally, the petition must allege a breach of the particular special agreement.[5] A complaint based on an oral agreement is demurrable where it alleges the issuance of a bill of lading and fails to show the oral contract was not merged in the bill.[6] A count alleging a special contract with an agent of the carrier must allege that the agent had authority to make it,[7] and when based on a contract forbidden by statute is demurrable.[8] In an action for breach of a special contract to furnish cars, the contract must be pleaded either in hæc verba or according to its legal effect.[9] A petition alleging an enforceable contract and containing sufficient averments of breach by the carrier with resultant damage, is good as against a general demurrer.[10] It is incumbent on the carrier to plead any defense he may have to the cause of action stated in plaintiff's pleadings.[11] The carrier must plead his defense that the services to be rendered under the special contract did not come within the tariffs on file and, therefore, the contract was void, unless plaintiff's pleadings show the invalidity of the contract for this reason.[12] A carrier seeking relief against a contract to transport, on the ground of mistake, must allege such mistake in its pleadings.[13] Inasmuch as an unprecedented rush of business constitutes no defense to an action for breach of contract to furnish cars,

Aider by verdict

Plaintiff brought suit on a contract to carry cattle, for refusal to carry; and the declaration alleged that for certain hire or reward, to be thereupon paid by plaintiff to defendant, the latter agreed to carry said stock. It was held that a reasonable construction of the contract was that the freight was to be paid at the end of the carriage, and that a verdict for plaintiff should not be arrested because the declaration did not aver a readiness to pay the charges at the time the contract of carriage was made.—Waterman v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 25 Vt. 707.

Want of consideration for written contract

Under Rev.St.1911, art. 7093, providing that a contract in writing shall import consideration, in an action against a carrier for delay in furnishing cars pursuant to alleged oral agreement, where defendant pleaded a subsequent written contract for transportation, it was incumbent on plaintiff to allege and prove want of consideration for written contract.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Smyth, Tex.Civ.App., 189 S.W. 70.

Petition or complaint held sufficient

In an action by a shipper of potatoes against the carrier for failure to carry out an agreement to reconsign the shipment, the petition was held to allege a definite breach of an oral special agreement on the carrier's part to immediately divert or reconsign by wire, on a given date, such shipment.—Cicardi Bros. Fruit & Produce Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 213 S.W. 531, 201 Mo.App. 609.

11. Good defense

In an action against a carrier of live stock for breach of an oral agreement to furnish cars, a plea alleging a written contract merging all previous negotiations, and providing stipulation for notice, and that suit should be brought within six months or action should be barred, set up a good defense in the absence of a showing of want of consideration, duress, fraud, or mistake.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Smyth, Tex.Civ.App., 189 S.W. 70.

War necessities

In a shipper's action for breach of contract by the carrier to furnish stock cars at a certain time and place for shipment of plaintiff's cattle, the carrier being under federal control, if defendant desired to present the defense that delay in furnishing the cars was occasioned by war necessities of the government, it was incumbent on him to plead and prove such defense.—Cornwell v. Davis, 213 P. 218, 66 Mont. 100, certiorari granted Davis v. Cornwell, 43 S.Ct. 700, 262 U.S. 740, 67 L.Ed. 1209, reversed on other grounds 44 S.Ct. 410, 264 U.S. 560, 68 L.Ed. 848, mandate conformed to Cornwell v. Davis, 226 P. 1117, 70 Mont. 608.

as shown supra § 133, an allegation in the answer setting up such facts is irrelevant and should be stricken out.[14]

A carrier's plea to the jurisdiction in an attachment suit, based on the fact that it is a nonresident railroad having no place of business nor owning or operating a railroad in the state, and that the trial thereof would interfere with interstate commerce, is properly dismissed when the attachment is based on an accord and satisfaction of a claim for breach of a contract of carriage.[15]

Issues, proof, and variance. The rules applicable generally to questions of evidence admissible under the issues, and to variance between pleadings and proof, as stated in the C.J.S. title Pleading §§ 512–546, also 49 C.J. p 780 et seq, apply to this class of actions.[16] Where it is alleged that the contract contained a certain stipulation as to unloading, which defendant violated, plaintiff must prove that the contract contained such stipulation.[17] Evidence of failure to furnish cars as promised is admissible under an allegation of a verbal promise to accept goods for transportation on or about a certain date,[18] but evidence of treatment during shipment is inadmissible where damages before loading only are claimed.[19] There is no variance between allegations that the contract was made with two named agents of the carrier and proof of negotiations with one by telegram and letter and a verbal contract with the other.[20]

Evidence. The burden of proof is on plaintiff to show by sufficient competent evidence the making of a special contract,[21] negligence in refusing to accept goods for interstate shipment as agreed,[22] and also to show the amount of damages sustained from a breach.[23] The carrier, however, has the burden

Evidence held inadmissible

Where the answer denies the allegations of the complaint and alleges that defendant entered into a contract for shipment which required notice of any claim for damages, which notice was not given, testimony of a witness that he on behalf of plaintiff requested cars and informed the agent of the number required is competent under the issues.—St. Louis, etc., R. Burden of proof

In a shipper's action against a carrier for failure to ship certain mules according to contract wherein special damages were claimed on the ground that the mules had been purchased for sale to the government for war purposes, it was necessary for plaintiff to prove that the live stock was up to the government standard, and would have passed inspection.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Davis, Tex.Civ.App., 225 S.W. 773.

Evidence held admissible

(1) In an action against an interstate carrier on an alleged oral agreement to furnish cars, evidence that defendants' dispatcher immediately advised the agent with whom plaintiff talked that the cars could not be furnished on the day required by plaintiff, was admissible.—Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Smyth, Tex.Civ.App., 189 S.W. 70.

(2) In an action for a carrier's failure to transport a corpse as agreed, whereby the funeral was delayed and had to be shortened, questions as to the whereabouts of plaintiff's children at the time and as to who accompanied plaintiff to the station were not erroneous as immaterial and irrelevant to any issue.—Texas Electric Ry. v. Blank, Tex. Civ.App., 247 S.W. 314.

(3) In an action against a carrier for breach of its contract to transport the remains of plaintiff's wife to the place of burial, evidence that plaintiff had intended to open the casket at the place of burial to permit friends to view the remains, but was unable to do so because of the delay resulting from defendant's breach, was admissible as establishing one of the elements of damage for which recovery was sought.—Texas Electric Ry. v. Blank, supra.
10 C.J. p 215 note 85 [a].

Evidence held sufficient

(1) Evidence that shipper frequently requested cars at point not on carrier's lines, and obtained them through traveling fast-freight agent, warrants finding that carrier, by a course of dealing, had led shipper to

of proving affirmative matters raised by it as a defense.[24]

Trial. In actions of this character, as in other civil actions, questions of fact, such as the existence of the special contract and damages arising from a breach thereof, on which the evidence is conflicting are for the determination of the jury[25] believe that furnishing cars at such point was not unusual, and that the contract so to furnish them was not beyond the scope of the agent's authority.—Kissell v. Pittsburgh, Ft W & C. Ry. Co., 188 S.W. 1118, 194 Mo.App. 346.

(2) In an action against an express company for the value of two packages, delivered to it for shipment to a named consignee, where plaintiff testified that on two different dates in the same month he delivered to the company two packages containing a quantity of watches, addressed to the consignee at hotels in Lexington, Ky., and Birmingham, Ala., which packages were not received by the consignee, dismissal of the complaint as for failure of proof was improper, and judgment for defendant company thereon cannot stand.—Schiff v. American Ry. Express Co., 180 N.Y.S. 480.

(3) Evidence in an action against an interurban electric railway company was held to sustain the jury's finding that defendant agreed to transport the corpse on a designated car, so that it breached its contract by refusing to do so, although its offer to transport the corpse on a later car was refused by the undertaker, who transported it by automobile.—Texas Electric Ry. v. Blank, Tex.Civ.App., 247 S.W. 314.

(4) Although testimony by plaintiff that the delay in transporting the corpse of his wife to the place of burial disturbed his mind and was very unpleasant was insufficient alone to justify the jury in finding humiliation or mental anguish, such finding could be based thereon in connection with a consideration of the facts and circumstances attending the delay which resulted from the failure to transport and its consequences.—Texas Electric Ry. v. Blank, supra.

Evidence held insufficient

(1) In an action for breach of contract to transport corn into Mexico without reloading into other cars, to establish that the tariffs on file made no provision for such service, and thus to show illegality of the contract as a matter of law.—Brunswig v Bush, Mo.App., 221 S.W. 759, certiorari dismissed Bush v. Brunswig, 41 S.Ct. 9, 254 U.S. 660, 65 L.Ed. 462.

(2) In consignee's action against a railroad for damage to goods based on alleged agreement of railroad to pay for damage if consignee would receive and remove the goods, to prove that railroad employee who made such contract had authority so to do.—Gennet v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 117 A. 706, 97 N.J.Law 486.

(3) In action for breach of carrier's contract to deliver cars to orchard for shipment of peaches, to show that plaintiffs' damages certainly would have been diminished had they delivered fruit at station of defendant carrier or at that of another carrier.—Texas & N. O. Ry. Co. v. Weems, Tex.Com.App., 222 S.W. 972, affirming, Civ.App., 184 S.W. 1103.

(4) To sustain a verdict finding an agreement by defendant to ship plaintiff's goods to destination within a certain time.—Emil Grossman Mfg. Co. v. New York Cent. R. Co., 169 N.Y.S. 213, 181 App.Div. 764.

(5) To show that an express driver receiving goods for delivery without a direction from his employer had any apparent authority to contract in its behalf for their delivery.—Wolf Thread Co. v. Rosenbusch, 180 N.Y.S. 94.

(6) To show that responsible officials of railway and express agency ratified their joint local agent's agreement to pay shipper for trucking belated express shipments to main line station, precluding shipper's recovery therefor.—Campbell v. St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co., Tex.Civ.App., 59 S.W.2d 467, error dismissed.

(7) In shipper's action against railroad for refusal to accept cattle on certain date pursuant to agreement, requiring shipper to drive cattle back to the farm in a snowstorm, to show the railroad was negligent in not notifying shipper, before he left home with the cattle, that they would not be received because of snowstorm making transportation impossible.—Crowdis v. Quincy, O. & K. C. R. Co., Mo.App., 255 S.W. 347.

(8) In shipper's action against railroad for delay in shipment for cattle following refusal to accept cattle on a certain date pursuant to agreement to accept them on such date for shipment into other state, because of snowstorm making it appear that cattle could not be transported on such date, to show the railroad was guilty of negligence in refusing to accept cattle on such date.—Crowdis v. Quincy, O. & K. C. R. Co., supra.

24. Abnormal demand for cars

Where a carrier seeks to excuse its failure to perform its obligations as to supplying itself with adequate transportation facilities because of an abnormally great and unforeseen demand for, or shortage of, cars, it assumes the burden of proving such alleged fact.—Vander Zyl v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 189 N.W. 953, 195 Iowa 901, error dismissed Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Vander Zyl, 45 S.Ct. 10, 266 U.S. 636, 69 L.Ed. 481.

Authority of agent

Evidence that chief clerk in manifest bureau of defendant railroad acted as the traffic manager's assistant in agreeing to furnish plaintiffs live stock cars for shipment originating on a connecting road, etc., makes his authority to bind defendant a jury question.—Southern Pac. Co. v. Stevens, Ariz., 258 F. 165, 169 C.C.A. 233.

New promise

In an action against a railroad for failure to place a refrigerator car to receive lettuce, whether or not a new promise was made, on the day after the first attempt to order the car, to place it by 2:30 P.M. may be a question for the jury.—Futch v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 100 S.E. 436, 178 N.C. 282.

Place for furnishing

(1) Whether the contract was to furnish cars at L., on defendant carrier's line, or at N., fifty miles away, at point of plaintiff shipper's business and point of loading, may, under the evidence, be a jury question.—Kissell v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. Ry. Co., 188 S.W. 1118, 194 Mo.App. 346.

(2) Where cars were frequently furnished to plaintiff at his place of business at N., fifty miles from the carrier's line, and the carrier agreed to furnish him cars, the court cannot say, as a matter of law, that the carrier was bound only to furnish the cars at the nearest point on its lines to N., or that there was no meeting of the minds.—Kissell v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. Ry. Co., supra.

Special damages

In a shipper's action against a carrier for damages arising from the carrier's failure to ship certain mules according to contract wherein special damages were claimed, based on a purchase for the purpose of sale to under proper instructions.[26]

A nonsuit must be entered in an action on a special contract where it is clear plaintiff is not entitled to recover.[27]

Damages. The damages which the shipper is entitled to recover are those proximately and naturally resulting from the failure of the carrier to comply with the terms of the contract,[28] but nothing beyond this.[29] If increased freight charges result from the failure to furnish cars, the shipper is entitled to recover the excess freight.[30] So, the shipper is entitled to recover the difference in the market value of the goods, if the market declined during the delay,[31] depreciation in the goods themselves rendering them less valuable,[32] and also to recover any expenses incurred in paying for pasturage, and for the employment of labor to look after the cattle for which the cars were to be furnished, and in supplying food for horses used for that purpose.[33]

the government for war purposes, the question as to whether the mules would have passed inspection if they had reached destination, was under the evidence, one for the jury.—Gulf, C & S F Ry. Co. v. Davis, Tex.Civ. App., 225 S.W. 773.

26. Iowa—Vander Zyl v. Chicago, R I & P. Ry. Co., 189 N.W. 953, 195 Iowa 901, error dismissed Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co v. Vander Zyl, 45 S.Ct 10, 266 U.S. 636, 69 L.Ed 481.

Instructions

(1) In a suit by a live stock shipper against a carrier for breach of an oral agreement to furnish cars, failure to instruct as to the meaning of the term "oral contract" is not error—Thee v. Wabash Ry. Co., 233 S.W. 959, 208 Mo App. 200.

(2) Where, in an action for failure to furnish a refrigerator car to receive lettuce, the one ordering the car testified that he also ordered two cars for another, designating the number of cars by raising two fingers and then one, an instruction to find for plaintiff if order was given and "understood" by defendant's agent was not erroneous, in that use of quoted word referred to understanding of terms of order—Futch v Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 100 S.E. 436, 178 N.C. 282.

27. Pa.—Harris Bros. Corporation v. Philadelphia & Reading Ry. Co., 84 Pa Super. 116.

Nonperformance of condition

(1) In assumpsit for breach of contract for failure of express company to transport goods, nonsuit is properly entered where plaintiff gave company a conditional order to procure from a steamship company certain goods, and plaintiff failed to prove condition imposed was performed—Chambers v. American Ry. Express Co., 83 Pa Super. 71.

(2) In such case, having taken a receipt for the delivery order, containing a clause requiring written demand for any losses within four months, failure to prove filing of such a claim within stipulated period was a further reason for entering a nonsuit—Chambers v. American Ry. Express Co., supra.

Forged bill

In assumpsit for breach of contract by a common carrier, a nonsuit is properly entered where defense was that bill of lading was a forgery, and plaintiff failed to produce sufficient evidence to establish the contrary.—Harris Bros. Corporation v. Philadelphia & Reading Ry. Co., 84 Pa Super 116.

Cost of hauling to depot

Damages for carrier's breach of contract to furnish cars on private tracks were not limited to cost of hauling property to depot, where cars could not have been obtained there—Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Weems, Tex.Civ.App., 184 S.W. 1103, affirmed, Com.App., 222 S.W. 972.

Expenditures for insurance paid on the goods during the period of delay in securing transportation are also allowable.—Shores Lumber Co. v. Stark, 76 N.W. 366, 100 Wis. 498.

Interest is an element of damages recoverable from a common carrier for breach of a contract to receive and transport freight—Cobb, Blasdel & Co. v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 38 Iowa 601.

Loss of profits

Where a carrier, with full notice of the situation, violated its contract to furnish cars to a purchaser of cattle, it is liable for all resulting damages, including damages for loss of profits minus freight charges, even though the purchaser forfeited his contract and never obtained title to the cattle—Weatherford, M. W. & N. W. Ry. Co. v King, Tex.Civ.App., 280 S.W. 235.

Amount

In an action for a carrier's refusal to transport the corpse of plaintiff's wife on the car agreed, where the refusal delayed the funeral one hour and twenty minutes and caused the ceremony to be somewhat shortened, preventing an opportunity to permit friends to view the remains, a judgment awarding one thousand dollars damages was excessive, and must be reversed, unless plaintiff agrees to remit therefrom five hundred dollars—Texas Electric Ry. v. Blank, Tex.Civ.App., 247 S.W. 314.

Depreciation at destination, not point of shipment

Under contract to supply cars for shipment of live stock, which the carrier broke by delay in supplying cars, knowing that stock was intended for sale on market in distant city, the measure of damages is not amount of depreciation at point of shipment, but depreciation in market value at destination—Levy v. Nevada-California-Oregon Ry., 160 P 808, 81 Or. 673, L.R.A.1917B 564

32. Tenn—Southern Ry Co v. Shipley, 245 S.W. 524, 147 Tenn. 40.
10 C.J. p 215 note 91.

Value at market not recoverable

Where a shipper who failed to give notice of claim was entitled to recover for breach of contract to furnish the car, which was not affected by the bill of lading, but not to recover for damages during transportation under the bill of lading, he cannot recover damages resulting from depreciation in value at the market, although the delay in reaching the market was due to the delay in furnishing the car, since an allowance for such depreciation assumes a contract to transport to the market—Southern Ry Co. v Shipley, 245 S.W 524, 147 Tenn. 40.

33. Tex—Southern Kansas R Co. v. Samples, Civ.App., 109 S.W. 417.
10 C.J p 215 note 92.

Loss sustained on account of contracts entered into on the faith of a stipulated rate may be recovered on failure of the carrier to transport at the rate agreed on.[34]

While it is the duty of the shipper, on failure of the carrier to comply with its contract to furnish cars, to exercise reasonable diligence to avoid or to lessen his damages, the principle does not require him in the exercise of ordinary care to make a new contract with the carrier which had just broken an identical one, and again agree to pay it for services which it is already under legal obligation to perform.[35]

Where a pipe line company is agent and carrier of the buyer of oil, it cannot recover of the seller for damages for the seller's refusal to deliver oil to it after the buyer had breached the contract, without showing that its damages were caused by the breach by the seller of some duty owing by him.[36]

Special damages may be recovered of a carrier for breach of contract where the carrier had knowledge at the time of the contract that a negligent breach thereof would result in special damages.[37] Hence, the fact that the shipper, at the time he made the contract with the carrier, informed its agent that he wished to make contracts with third persons for the sale of the goods to them, and the further fact that he did make such contract afterward, do not entitle a recovery from the carrier of profits which would have been made but for the breach of the contract of carriage.[38]

Damages resulting from act of shipper. Where, on refusal of a carrier to comply with the contract for transportation, the shipper abandons the shipment which is destroyed, the carrier is not liable for the loss resulting from such abandonment. Where a wrong has been committed, the damaged party must not increase it, and he has no right to complain of loss sustained by his willful acts of omission or commission.[39]

L. AUTHORITY OF AGENTS TO MAKE CONTRACTS FOR CARRIER

§ 135. In General

The question of whether contracts made by the agent of a carrier bind the carrier depends on the general principles of agency, such contracts being binding when within the scope of the agent's authority.

In determining whether a contract made for the carrier by an agent is binding, the principles of agency are applicable, and the general rule is well settled that, if the contract is within the general scope of authority of the agent, the carrier will be bound thereby, although the agent has acted beyond his instructions in the particular case.[40] This is in accordance with the well settled principle that the powers of the agent are prima facie coextensive with the business intrusted to his care and will not be narrowed by limitations not communicated to the persons with whom he deals.[41] Applying this principle it is very generally held that, where a railroad company places an agent in charge of its business at a station, and empowers him to contract for the shipment of freight, it holds him out to the public as having authority to contract with reference to all the necessary and ordinary details of the business, and, within the range of such business, he becomes a general agent, and may bind the company by a contract within the scope of his apparent authority, although in making the contract he may have exceeded his authority.[42] Strangers or other persons

Posting of forfeit by shipper
Carrier, notified of shipper's placing of forfeit to insure compliance with his contract to purchase the goods he intended to ship, is liable in special damages for failure to furnish cars at a specified time as agreed.—Weatherford, M. W. & N. W. Ry. Co. v. King, Tex.Civ.App., 280 S.W. 235.

delivering goods for transportation are not bound to inquire whether the person found at the depot ready to receive goods is authorized to transact such business, and the carriers cannot evade their responsibility for failure to carry and deliver goods so received.[43] These contracts will be binding on the carrier, although oral,[44] or although they were made before the goods were actually delivered.[45] Such is ordinarily the rule in respect of contracts made by freight agents of the carrier,[46] or by subagents appointed or designated by a general agent having power to contract for the carrier,[47] or by a clerk apparently in charge of a freight office.[48] In all cases where the contract is within the apparent scope of the agent's authority, the carrier cannot escape liability thereon, unless the shipper had actual knowledge that in making the contract the agent exceeded his authority.[49] So long as the agent has apparent authority to contract, the shipper is under no obligation to make inquiries as to his authority and is not chargeable with notice of a limitation of the agent's right to contract,[50] and the burden is on the carrier to show that the parties, when the contract was made, had knowledge of the fact that the agent was acting beyond his authority, if it seeks to escape liability on the ground that the contract is unauthorized.[51]

Contracts not within scope of apparent authority. On the other hand, an agent cannot bind the carrier beyond what may fairly be presumed, from the character of his employment, to be his authority;[52] and, if the shipper seeks to enforce such contract, the burden is on him to show actual authority on the part of the agent to make it.[53] Thus the local station agent's authority presumptively extends only to the control of the carrier's business at his own station, and he cannot act for the carrier in the matter of shipping from stations other than that at which he is employed, unless expressly or impliedly authorized so to do.[54] It is generally regarded that a local agent cannot bind the carrier by contract to transport goods from points distant from the carrier's railroad,[55] nor assume liability for the acts of preceding carriers.[56] Where nothing more appears than that the person making the agreement was "clerk" or "chief clerk" having charge of the clerical work of the carrier at a certain place, he will not be regarded as having implied authority to bind the carrier by contracts for shipment of goods.[57]

A contract made by an unauthorized agent may be ratified by an authorized agent, notwithstanding the want of authority of the former,[58] and the carrier may ratify a contract made by its agent in violation of its rules.[59] Ratification is necessary to charge a carrier on a contract outside the scope of an agent's authority.[60] When a new contract for transportation of goods which could not be shipped under the original contract because of damage, which would be increased, was void because made by one having no authority to bind the carrier, acceptance of the shipment and the loading of a part of it could not bind the carrier where done by the same person who made the new contract.[61]

Authority disclosed by title

Chief clerk in charge of clerical work of railroad at its office at a dock was not authorized to bind railroad by making new contract for transportation of silk cargo, which because of its wet and fermented condition could not be forwarded under the original shipping contract, the words "clerk" or "chief clerk" being suggestive only of clerical functions, and not of discretionary power to make important contracts.—Davis v. contract is not within the scope of the agent's authority, it is of course not binding on the carrier.[62] A bill of lading being in a form and on a rate approved by the interstate commerce commission, no agent could be authorized to vary its terms for the advantage of a shipper, by undertaking additional responsibility on behalf of the carrier.[63]

A carrier is not estopped to deny liability for goods accepted and receipted for by an impostor posing as an agent of the carrier, the carrier not having held out such impostor as an ostensible agent.[64]

One common carrier may in a proper case act as agent for another carrier.[65]

Knowledge of agent as affecting principal. Where a shipper has undertaken the packing of his goods, mere knowledge of the carrier's agent that the packing was negligently done cannot impose liability on the carrier for injuries resulting from such negligent packing.[66]

§ 136. Contracts for Furnishing Cars

An agent properly authorized may make a binding contract to furnish cars. Unauthorized contracts may be ratified.

Contracts to furnish cars, when made by an agent apparently authorized to represent the carrier in such matters, are binding on the carrier.[67] Such contracts may be oral.[68]

The general manager of a railroad has authority to make contracts to furnish cars to shippers.[69]

General freight agent. The general freight agent of a division of a railroad has authority to make contracts to furnish trains for moving freight,[70] and he has authority to bind the carrier by a contract to furnish a certain number of cars on a specified day for the transportation of freight,[71] as has the commercial freight agent.[72]

Conductor of train. The carrier is bound by the promise of a freight train conductor to furnish cars for a shipper, where he has been intrusted generally with such power and authorized to exercise it.[73]

Station agent. The station agent, having charge of a railroad company's business at a particular station, has implied authority to contract to furnish cars at particular times for the shipment of goods, and the company will be bound by such contracts, even though in violation of the company's directions to the agent, if the limitation of his authority is not known to the shipper.[74] A fortiori is this so where in the previous course of dealing between the same parties they recognize such contracts as valid,[75] and the rule has been held to apply, even though a reasonable time was not given to have the cars on hand.[76] The station agent likewise has authority to bind the carrier to furnish a particular kind of cars,[77] and it has further been held that a contract made by a station agent to furnish a shipper a certain variety of cars belonging to another company is within the apparent scope of his authority and binds his principal.[78] Although it is not required that a station agent be authorized to contract to furnish a certain kind of car at a certain hour of a certain day, in violation of the rules of the carrier, the law requires that he be authorized to furnish reasonable facilities within a reasonable time for carrying on business either on his own authority or on his demand or notice to the company.[79] It has been held that such agent has implied authority to furnish cars for shipment to a destination beyond the carrier's line, and that, where the shipper has no notice to the contrary and relies on the appearance of authority, the contract made with the agent is binding on the company.[80] A local station agent also has authority to arrange for loading and receiving cars for transportation.[81] On the other hand, a station agent is not to be presumed, in the absence of evidence, to have authority to contract to furnish cars to shippers at other stations than his own;[82] but it has been otherwise held when the car was to be partially loaded at the one station and finished at the other;[83] and a local freight agent has no authority to bind the railroad by an agreement that cattle shall be shipped in a solid train, without mixing any other train with them, or that the train shall be drawn by a single engine.[84]

Ratification. An unauthorized contract to furnish cars at a certain place is ratified by the carrier by furnishing such cars at the place designated.[85]

§ 137. Contracts for Transportation on Connecting Line

In the absence of express or implied authority which, however, may be conferred by statute, an agent cannot bind the carrier by a contract for transportation over a connecting line.

In the absence of statutes providing otherwise, the weight of authority in this country is that the carrier receiving goods for transportation to a destination beyond its own line impliedly contracts as carrier only for its own line, and in jurisdictions where this is the rule it is evident that an agent attempting to contract for transportation over a connecting line is exceeding his ordinary authority as agent of the receiving carrier, and his principal is not bound by such contract, in the absence of express authority, or course of business from which such authority may be inferred;[86] and the statements of an agent of one carrier cannot impose a liability on a connecting carrier.[87] The authority of a station agent to bind a carrier by a contract of carriage to a point on a line of another carrier must be proved in order to hold the initial carrier for loss or damage occurring on the line of another company,[88] and is not to be inferred from the mere fact that the agent is authorized to receive goods for carriage,[89] or from the mere fact that the freight for the entire distance was collected by such agent;[90] but it is well settled that the authority of a station agent to bind a railroad company by a contract of carriage to a point beyond its terminus may be inferred from a previous course of dealing between the shipper and the carrier, as, for instance, where such contracts have been customarily made by the agent and assented to by the carrier,[91] and where two or more railroad companies with connecting lines have formed an association for the transportation of goods, the agent of one has apparent authority to contract for the shipment of goods over the connecting lines.[92] Agents or officers of an initial carrier, who give through rates after conferring with officers of the final carrier, act on behalf of the final carrier, and bind it by their acts and declarations.[93] Although an agent was without authority to make a contract for transportation of goods beyond its own line, such a contract may be ratified by acts of the carrier.[94]

§ 138. Stipulations as to Time and Place of Delivery

A contract for delivery at a stipulated time or place may, where such a contract is not illegal, be made by an authorized agent, as may a contract for delivery to the carrier.

Except as such contracts may be forbidden by statute,[95] an agent having authority to contract for the shipment of goods has apparent authority to stipulate for the delivery of such goods at a specified place within a specified time;[96] and such contracts may be by parol as well as in writing.[97] The fact that it is not within the actual scope of the agent's authority is of no consequence, unless the shipper has notice of the scope of his authority,[98] or the contract is so unusual and extraordinary that it could not reasonably be included within the general authority of the agent.[99] A mere expression of opinion as to time of arrival or delivery will not bind the carrier.[1]

Delivery to carrier. A station agent has authority generally to consent to, and bind the carrier by, any special arrangement in regard to delivery of the goods to the carrier for shipment.[2]

§ 139. Settlement of Claims for Damages

Agents authorized to do so may settle claims for damages.

A general freight agent having authority to adjust claims for damages may bind the carrier in the settlement of such a claim.[3] Likewise an agreement by an agent who customarily settled claims for the road will bind it,[4] and any limitation on his authority must be established by the carrier;[5] but a local station agent has no authority to bind the carrier by a contract to settle a claim for damages; such claims are passed on and determined by officers of

Freight agent

Where the freight agent of a railroad company is in the habit of settling claims for lost and damaged freight, but where there is a secret limitation that his authority only extends to settling claims for an amount not exceeding one hundred dollars, which fact is unknown to one with whom the agreement is made, then the agent had the apparent authority to make an agreement to settle the claim for lost and damaged freight, which agreement is binding on the railroad company.—New Orleans & N. E. R Co. v. Interstate Wholesale Grocers, 95 So. 316, 131 Miss. 157.

Release of shipper's liability on bond

In an action on bonds given to a carrier for the production of bills of lading covering shipments delivered without their production, evidence showing agent's authority to represent the carrier in securing return of merchandise shows conclusively that the carrier's agent, who negotiated for a return of the goods, had authority to release the shipper's liability on the bonds.—Russo v. Davis, C.C A Ill., 285 F. 231.

5. U.S.—Russo v. Davis, supra.

the company specially designated for that purpose and not by station agents.[6]

A claim agent's agreement that the carrier would return damaged goods to the point of shipment for repairs, without compensation, is binding on the carrier when ratified by it by so transporting the goods.[7] Where it appears that a freight station agent of a railroad company has extensive powers to dispose of perishable goods which a consignee has refused to accept in such manner as he considers to the best advantage of the company, he may bind the company by an agreement with a consignee that, if the latter will pay the freight due on carloads of such goods in a damaged condition and take the goods and sell them at the best price he can get, the railroad company will pay any loss sustained by reason of the condition of the goods.[8]

A carrier is not bound by an alleged agreement of his agent when the situation is an unusual and extraordinary one in which the agent has no implied authority to admit liability,[9] nor where the making of an agreement to adjust and pay damages is clearly beyond the authority of the particular agent.[10]

§ 140. Stipulations as to Rates, Rebates, and Discrimination

When not in violation of statutes, contracts stipulating as to rates and rebates may be made by authorized agents.

Except as such contracts may be in violation of statute, as shown infra §§ 392–397, an agent having authority to contract for shipment has also apparent authority to contract as to the rates of charge, on the line of his principal,[11] and as to rebates to be allowed the shipper, if a contract for rebates would be valid.[12] However, where such contracts are prohibited by law, an agent has no authority to contract with a shipper for transportation at a lower rate than that allowed to others,[13] or at a rate not authorized by a statutory classification.[14] It is not within the apparent scope of a local station agent's duties to fix rates on connecting lines in remote portions of the country over which the carrier did not undertake to carry property, and such carrier is not bound by the statement of its agent as to the rate that would be charged by the connecting company.[15]

§ 141. Authority in Respect to Other Contracts

a. In general
b. Bills of lading

a. In General

Such other contracts as a carrier may validly enter into may be made by authorized agents, and when so made will bind the carrier.

An agent who receives goods for shipment can bind the carrier by an agreement not to deliver without surrender of a bill of lading attached to a draft on the consignee,[16] or to give notice of the arrival of the goods at their destination,[17] or to ship goods by a certain train,[18] to furnish a special train,[19] or to reship goods,[20] or as to the unloading of live stock,[21] or to advance custom duties, unless the shipper had notice that the

Where it appeared that a consignee of a carload of melons, on discovering that they were damaged, refused to accept them until the freight cashier and one called an adjuster told him to go ahead and save as many as possible and that the company would stand the loss, the consignee's demands were extraordinary and unusual in view of his duty to accept and seek damages thereafter, and they created a situation to meet which there was no implied authority on the part of the agent so to admit liability, and no recovery could be had based on such agreement.—New Hampshire Wholesale Fruit Co. v. Agreement to unload at certain place

Where a shipper of cattle billed to L, a point twenty-five miles further on than E, asked the agent at E if there was plenty of water at E, so agent had no such authority,[22] or to hold cattle at a depository during a brief delay prior to shipment, where the carrier's general rules give the agents charge of their contracts subject to general rules and special orders, and where there is no evidence of a general rule or special order limiting such authority.[23] So an arrangement between the consignee of a trunk and the agent of an express company, by which the consignee is allowed to remove a part of the contents of the trunk and leave the trunk in the express company's custody, is within the apparent scope of the agent's authority and is binding on his principal, in the absence of any notice to the consignee of any restriction of the agent's authority.[24] The agent of a railroad company, while bound to receive goods for transportation, has the right to limit his company's liability for negligence to its own line, where such limitation is not forbidden by statute.[25]

On the other hand, it is not within the apparent authority of a station agent to make a contract of shipment by rail to a station on a line not yet open for operation,[26] or to receive,[27] or to deliver,[28] goods at a place on the company's road other than a regular station, and the burden of proving the agent's authority to make such a contract is on the shipper.[29] So an agent of a receiving carrier has no authority to bind a connecting carrier by a statement to a shipper that his check will be accepted at the other end of the line,[30] and a guaranty that the price of the goods shipped shall be paid by the consignee is not presumed to be within the power of a general shipping agent.[31] In the absence of proof of authority to do so an agent of a carrier cannot bind it by a contract to purchase goods.[32] An agent of an express company has no authority to agree on the part of the company to pay the undertaker's charges on a corpse and to ship it.[33] An express driver having authority to call for and receive goods for delivery under a contract with the express company, has not, therefore, authority to receive goods from a third person without the knowledge of the company, this being the making of a contract for the company.[34]

It cannot be assumed from the nature of the employment that a station agent has authority to make a verbal contract to feed and water stock in the company's stockyard.[35] Where a consignor of cattle agreed to accompany them, that the conductor told him, after part of the trip had been made, that it would be all right if he did not accompany the cattle the rest of the distance will not release the consignor without proof that the conductor was authorized to annul the contract.[36] Evidence that the agent of a carrier who furnished to a shipper of horses a special car owned by a different company was authorized by the owner of the car to make contracts for its use does not show that he had authority to make a contract for its use for an interrupted trip at the rate specified in the car company's schedules for a continuous trip.[37]

A station agent cannot, by his admissions, bind the carrier to a new agreement and deprive it of the requirements of a written contract entered into by the shipper with it.[38]

b. Bills of Lading

In general a carrier is bound by bills of lading issued that shipper could exercise his right to terminate the transportation at E and unload the cattle there, the agent's affirmative reply to such inquiry on which the shipper relied and acted by unloading the cattle at E was held within the scope of the agent's authority, being in relation to the proper conduct of the carrier's business at E, and the shipper could rely on such representation without making an independent investigation to ascertain if the water supply there was ample.—Davis v. Purchase of coal for railroad

In action by carrier against shipper of coal for freight charges and demurrage, a defense that plaintiff bought the coal, and that the freight and demurrage due were to be a part of the price, is not sustained, where it was not shown that employee of plaintiff alleged to have made the contract had authority to make it, or was held out as having such authority.—Lake & Export Coal Corporation v. by authorized agents and may not deny receipt of any or all of the goods described therein; but in some jurisdictions the rule, when not otherwise changed by statute, is that an agent has no authority to issue a bill of lading without actual receipt of goods and hence cannot bind the carrier.

The terms of a bill of lading issued by an agent authorized to do so are binding on the carrier.[39]

Liability for goods not received. By the express provision of the Federal Uniform Bills of Lading Act, the issuing of a bill of lading by an agent or employee acting within the scope of his actual or apparent authority renders the carrier liable to the owner of goods covered by a straight bill and subject to stoppage in transit, or to the holder in good faith for value, of an order bill, for damages caused by the nonreceipt of the carrier of all or part of the goods, or their failure to correspond to the description in the bill at the time of its issue. This provision imposes a new liability on the carrier for the acts of the agent in issuing a bill of lading when no goods have been received for shipment,[40] and under its terms a carrier has been held liable on a bill forged by its employee,[41] and to a bona fide holder for the quantity of goods specified in the bill.[42] However, this provision will not allow a shipper to recover for loss of property where the property was never delivered to the carrier, although the bill of lading recites its receipt.[43]

In those jurisdictions which have adopted the Uniform Bills of Lading Act a provision similar to that of the federal act is in force, limited in its application, of course, to bills of lading issued in intra-state shipments or to shipments in foreign commerce not governed by the federal act. This provision does not create a new cause of action, but merely deprives the carrier of a defense which it was allowed to make before its enactment.[44]

No liability can be imposed on the carrier under the provisions of either the federal act or the Uniform Bills of Lading Act where the bill of lading was for a purely intra-state shipment, and the holder of the bill was not "one who has given value in good faith relying upon the description therein of the goods," as required by both the acts.[45]

Independently of the statutory provisions under consideration, a number of jurisdictions have regarded the carrier as liable on a bill of lading issued by an agent having authority to issue bills of lading, even though no goods were in fact received;[46] but

Statutory provisions

(1) A statutory provision in Alabama imposing liability for spurious bills of lading issued by one having authority to issue bills or direct or authorize their issuance, does not make a carrier liable for spurious bills of lading issued by an agent who had only authority to supervise subordinates authorized to issue bills of lading or by an unauthorized person acting under such agent—National Park Bank of New York v Louisville & N R. Co, 74 So. 69, 199 Ala. 192

(2) Such a provision does not authorize an agent having power to issue bills of lading for property received to empower third persons not in the carrier's employ or in the prosecution of its business to issue at will bills of lading without receipt of the property to be shipped—National Park Bank of New York v. Louisville & N. R. Co., supra.

the rule stated in a majority of the jurisdictions is that the agent of the carrier, having no authority to issue a bill of lading without actual receipt of the goods, cannot bind the carrier even as to an innocent transferee for value of the bill of lading.[47] Even where the carrier was regarded as bound by his agent's act, it was held that the doctrine of equitable estoppel does not protect one who purchases a bill of lading or makes advances thereon either with actual knowledge or with reliable information that the recitals therein with respect to the receipt of the freight by the carriers are not true.[48]

Where a carrier gives its agent express authority to issue bills of lading for goods before actual receipt of the goods, the carrier will be bound by his act in issuing a bill of lading where the bill of lading has passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value, although no goods are actually received.[49]

Even though a carrier might not be bound by a bill of lading issued by its agent for goods which are never received, it does not follow that the carrier is not bound thereby, if the goods are in fact subsequently delivered, to be transported according to the terms of the contract; and, where the agent of a railroad company issues a bill of lading without the goods in hand and they are susbequently delivered, the contract takes effect, and the carrier is bound as if the goods had originally been delivered.[50]

A carrier may ratify the unauthorized act of its agent in issuing a bill of lading without actual receipt of the goods, but there is no ratification if the act relied on to establish it was in itself induced by deceit or mistake.[51]

M. DELIVERY AND ACCEPTANCE, AND CUSTODY AND CONTROL OF GOODS

§ 142. Delivery to and Acceptance by Carrier

Delivery to, and acceptance of, goods by it are essential to impose on a carrier the duties and obligations of a common carrier.

In order that the carrier may be charged with reference to the custody, care, and transportation of goods, it is essential that as bailee it shall have come into possession of the goods, which, of course, involves a delivery by the shipper and an acceptance by the carrier, and until there has been such delivery and acceptance, by which the possession of the goods has been transferred from the shipper to the carrier, no liability of the carrier with reference to such goods arises.[52] To constitute actual delivery

(3) The fact that cotton had been previously delivered by connecting carriers on spurious bills of lading of defendant, does not show that the issuance of subsequent bills of lading was within the scope of the authority of defendant's agent.—National Park Bank of New York v. Louisville & N. R. Co., supra.

Rule unaffected by criminal statute

Where a carrier is liable on a bill issued by an authorized agent although no goods have been received, the operation of the rule is not affected by the fact that it is made a crime by statute for the agent to issue a bill of lading without having received the freight.—Hutchings v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 114 P. 1077, 84 Kan. 479, 41 L.R.A.,N.S., 500—10 C.J. p 197 note 77.

10 C.J. p 197 note 80.

Rule unaffected by criminal statute

Where the carrier is regarded as not liable on a bill of lading where no goods are received, the rule is in no way affected by a statute making it a felony to sign or to issue false receipts or bills of lading for property not actually received or delivered.—Henderson v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 41 So. 252, 116 La. 1047, 1052, 114 Am.S.R. 582—10 C.J. p 198 note 83.

Statute making bills of lading negotiable for certain purposes does not affect the rule.—Roy v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 85 P. 53, 42 Wash. 572, 6 L.R.A.,N.S., 302, 7 Ann.Cas. 728.

Fraudulent conduct or mere mistake

(1) In the application of this rule it was of no consequence whether the act of the agent was fraudulent and collusive or merely the result of a mistake.—National Bank of Commerce v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 46 N.W. 342, 560, 44 Minn. 224, 20 Am.S.R. 566, 9 L.R.A. 263.

(2) Nor would the fraudulent course of conduct of the agent for some time in so issuing bills of lading raise a presumption of the carrier's ratification.—Fitch v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 155 N.Y.S. 1079, 170 App. Div. 222.

Rule not applicable where goods received by connecting carrier

It was within the scope of the authority of a railroad's agent to issue a bill of lading binding it to take up a carload of corn from its connecting carrier and to continue the carriage from its destination under bill of lading issued by the original carrier to a new destination.—Chicago & G.W. and acceptance, there must be a real and present transfer of the physical possession and control of the goods.[53] On the other hand, a carrier, prima facie, by accepting goods for transportation, incurs the responsibilities of a common carrier,[54] and no formal acceptance is necessary where the agent has knowledge of the delivery of the goods with the intention that they be shipped, and makes no objection thereto.[55]

It is not incumbent on a carrier to inspect the contents of a shipment on receipt thereof and the issuance of a bill of lading,[56] and, indeed, it has been held that the carrier is not permitted to do so.[57]

§ 143. Time and Place

The time and place for delivery to a carrier are generally controlled by the regulations made by such carriers, unless altered by custom or other agreement.

As discussed in § 25 supra, carriers may make reasonable regulations as to the time when goods shall be tendered for shipment, and a tender at some other time will not, it seems, amount to a delivery; but a custom imposing conditions as to the hours within which shipments will be received or forwarded by a carrier becomes immaterial if the conditions are waived and the shipment is in fact accepted by the carrier for the purpose of transportation and delivery to the consignee.[58]

Under its right to make and enforce reasonable regulations, a carrier may fix the places at which it will receive and deliver freight, and it cannot be compelled to receive or handle it at other places.[59] Hence, as a general rule, the mere placing or depositing of goods at some place other than that at which the carrier is accustomed to receive goods does not amount to a delivery nor charge the carrier as such for loss or injury to the goods,[60] and this is especially true where the goods are so deposited for the shipper's own convenience.[61] This principle has received frequent application in the case of goods placed along the right of way of the carrier,[62] or near switches or sidings.[63] Where, however, the carrier directs the goods to be left

Coal taken by carrier for its own use

Loading coal on cars of defendant railroad company by a coal company at its mine and giving the conductor shipping orders directing that the cars be taken to the scale station, to which point only cars were moved on the shipping orders, and where they were consigned and waybills issued, and that they be there consigned to plaintiff, a contract customer was not a delivery of the coal to defendant as carrier for plaintiff, which was not present and had no part in the transaction, where defendant had a contract with the coal company for fuel coal, giving it the right of priority over all other orders, and under which, pursuant to its terms, defendant took the coal for its own use and notified the coal company of its action.—Phoenix Portland Cement Co. v. Placing on platform at depot

A carrier, having posted notice that it would not be liable for goods left on platform until issuance of bill of lading, was not liable for loss of bale of cotton placed on platform by shipper, but stolen prior to issuance of bill of lading, notwithstanding shipper's custom of placing cotton on platform when purchased without obtaining bill of lading until the close of the business day, when bill of lading for the full day's purchases would be issued.—Behrmann v. at a particular place, agreeing to receive them there, a deposit of the goods at that place constitutes sufficient delivery to charge the carrier.[64] The carrier may also by special arrangement with the shipper or by implication from habitual custom and usage agree to accept and receive goods for transportation placed along its line for shipment at places other than the regularly designated places for the reception and delivery of freight; and by reason of such usage, custom, or agreement, a deposit of goods by the shipper at a place where it would not ordinarily be bound to accept goods for transportation may constitute a delivery sufficient to charge the carrier as an insurer for loss or injury to the goods.[65]

To complete delivery it is essential that the property should be placed in such a position that it may be taken care of by the agent or person having charge of the business and under his immediate control.[66] Even the placing of the goods on the vehicle of the carrier, whether it is a wagon or a car, ready for transportation, will not constitute sufficient delivery, where this is not done in pursuance of any previous understanding and the agent has no notice from which an acceptance can be inferred;[67] and, of course, there is no delivery where a car is loaded under these circumstances, and the carrier's agent on being notified thereof declines to ship the goods.[68]

The provisions of the uniform bill of lading that property destined to, or taken from, a station at which there is no regularly appointed agent and when received or delivered on private or other sidings, shall be at owner's risk until the cars are attached to trains, do not apply to loaded cars on a public or semipublic siding or one which is in fact part of the carrier's terminal system at a station at which there are regularly appointed agents, and, at least, where a bill of lading has been issued, such goods are not at the owner's risk.[69] The rule is otherwise, however, as to cars on strictly private industry tracks effectively separated from the terminal and exclusively under private control.[70]

§ 144. Notice of Delivery

In the absence of special contract, custom, or usage, notice of delivery must be given to the carrier or an agent thereof.

In the absence of special contract, custom, or usage, it is not sufficient that the property is delivered on the carrier's premises or placed in a position from which it might readily be taken by the carrier or its agent, but there must be notice to it or its agent of the delivery, and intention to place the goods in the care and custody of the carrier for transportation.[71]

Special contract, custom, or usage. The general rule just stated is subject to any conventional arrangement between the carrier and its patrons, or to a custom or usage in their dealings which dispenses with the giving of actual notice to the carrier of the delivery of the goods. In other words, constructive delivery may be made sufficient by a special contract, custom, or usage, and the placing of the goods by the shipper in the place at which they are accustomed to be deposited, or at a place specially designated by contract, will be a sufficient delivery and acceptance to charge the carrier as an

Cars on private sidings

(1) Where a bill of lading provided that, when goods were received on private or other sidings, they should be at owner's risk until car was attached to a train and the car had been loaded and sealed up and the carrier notified thereof, the carrier had a reasonable time thereafter to take charge of property before becoming liable for damages thereto by fire breaking out prior to its removal.—Chickasaw Cooperage Co. v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co., 215 S.W. 897, 141 Ark. 71.

(2) Where carrier had no notice that cars spotted on ginner's spur had been loaded, had received no shipping instructions, and had issued no bills of lading, it was not liable for destruction by fire of cotton in such cars, although it had occasionally hauled without prior request loaded cars from spur to side track some miles away to await shipping instructions or issuance of bills of lading.—Sentell v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., La.App., 160 So. 847.

insurer, although no actual notice is given to the carrier or assent shown.[72] This general principle has been held applicable even though the custom or usage relied on was contrary to the express directions and special regulations of the company, which fact was known to the shipper.[73] However, if custom or usage is relied on, there can be no constructive delivery of goods so as to bind the carrier for their carriage except at such place, as where by constant practice and usage they have received property left for transportation.[74] Constructive delivery may also be made by delivering to the carrier the receipt of a warehouseman or cotton compress company, from whose custody the goods are to be taken by the carrier, and the issuance of a bill of lading by the carrier's agent in consequence thereof,[75] especially where the compress company is the carrier's agent for compressing the cotton as preliminary to a more convenient transportation.[76]

§ 145. When Carrier's Liability as Such Attaches

a. In general
b. Delivery with directions to hold until further orders
c. Failure to give shipping directions
d. Failure to prepay freight
e. Issuance of receipt or bill of lading

a. In General

A carrier's liability attaches as soon as delivery to it is complete.

The risk of the carrier, as such, begins on delivery of the goods to it for immediate transportation,[77] that is, as soon as the delivery is complete

(1) The rule as stated in Corpus Juris, 10 C.J. p 223 note 86, has been quoted with approval and followed in First Nat. Bank v. Missouri Pac Ry., 278 S.W. 1075, 1078, 220 Mo.App. 941.

(2) The rule has also been cited with approval in:
Okl.—St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Blocker, 184 P. 584, 585, 76 Okl. 279.

Agreement between parties controls

A shipper and a carrier may make such stipulations on the matter of delivery as they see fit, and, when made, such agreements will govern.—Blackwell v. Oregon Short Line Ry. Co., 161 P. 565, 82 Or. 303

Constructive delivery

Plaintiff's act in purchasing cattle, ordering cars, and telling carrier's agent that he was ready to ship, and asking that he be notified on arrival of cars, stating that he would load and be ready to ship in two or three hours thereafter, constituted a constructive delivery of cattle for shipment, notwithstanding placing of cattle on pasture, since it was a temporary arrangement to end on arrival of cars for shipment.—Fewel v. St. Louis & S. F. Ry Co., Mo.App., 267 S.W. 960.

Engine foreman

Where custom is to notify the engine foreman orally, such notice is sufficient.—Straub v. Missouri Pac. R Co., 283 S.W. 36, 170 Ark. 1174.

Necessity of formal notice

Where the station agent and conductor of a common carrier were informed the day before an intended shipment that the cattle were to be put into the pens for shipment according to custom, no further formal notice was necessary.—Blackwell v. Oregon Short Line Ry. Co., 161 P. 565, 82 Or. 303.

Occasional action as "custom" or "usage"

The fact that a carrier occasionally hauled, without prior request, loaded cars from ginner's spur to sidetrack to await shipping instructions or issuance of bills of lading did not establish "custom" or "usage" of carrier to accept delivery of cotton on spur so as to be liable for destruction of cotton by fire while on spur, and before receipt of shipping instructions or issuance of bills of lading.—Sentell v. "It is the usual rule that the carrier becomes responsible as such at once upon delivery, unless the ship-

so as to place on the carrier the exclusive duty of seeing after their safety.[78] Delivery cannot be complete if anything remains to be done by the shipper before the goods can be sent on their way,[79] but if the thing to be done is something which it is the duty of the carrier to do, without

Goods placed in station

A carrier having accepted goods for shipment as soon as practicable in the usual course of business, and not to await further orders, and having placed them in the station for its own convenience, its liability as carrier for their loss commenced at once.—Dionne v. American Express Co., 101 A. 209, 91 Vt. 521.

Point of time

It is the general rule that the point of time marking the commencement of the carrier's liability is that moment when the shipper surrenders the entire custody of his goods and the carrier receives complete control of them for the purpose of shipment at the earliest practicable opportunity in the usual course of business.—Fewel v. St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co., Mo.App., 267 S.W. 960.

Under uniform bill of lading defendant is not relieved from liability as rail carrier, while goods are on board lighter for lighterage across harbor, so that carrier is liable for destruction of goods by fire while on board lighter, although it is conceded that it was guilty of no negligence; and bill of lading subsequently issued could not change obligations assumed by carrier on acceptance of goods—Charles J. Webb Sons Co. v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey, D.C.N.Y., 28 F.2d 392, affirmed, C.C.A., Charles J. Webb & Sons v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey, 36 F.2d 702.

Shipment of money

Where tariff classifications filed by an express company with the interstate commerce commission recited, in substance, that packages containing money would be received for transportation only when delivered at its office by the shipper and that a shipment of coin or bullion too heavy to be carried might be called for by wagon, but that a representative of the shipper must accompany the same and retain custody of the shipment until delivered at the express company's office, an express company's placing of currency and silver bullion in a strong box on the bank's premises and taking the box into a truck, accompanied by a representative of the bank, was not a waiver of the tariff provisions governing delivery—American Ry. Express Co. v. American Trust Co., C.C.A.Ind., 47 F.2d 16, reversing, D.C., American Trust Co. v. American Ry. As otherwise expressed the party bringing the goods must first do whatever is essential to enable the carrier to commence, or to make needful preparations for the service required from it, before it can be made liable or subject to responsibility in that capacity.—London, etc., F. Ins. Co. v. Rome, etc., R. Co., 39 N.E. 79, 144 N.Y. 200, 43 Am.S.R. 753.

Accumulation on platform

Carrier is not responsible for destruction by fire of cotton being accumulated by shipper, according to custom and consent of local agent, on station platform, until carload is made up.—Adair v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co., 107 So. 371, 142 Miss. 345.

Act precedent to shipment

If shipper must do some act as necessary precedent to shipment, delivery to railroad would not be delivery to it as common carrier, but, if shipper is to do nothing further, delivery is to railroad as common carrier.—Hill Mfg. Co. v. New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co., 78 So. 187, 117 Miss. 548, certiorari denied New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co. v. Hill Mfg. Co., 39 S.Ct. 11, 248 U.S. 571, 63 L.Ed. 426.

Entire quantity

A carrier is not liable as an insurer of goods to be shipped until the entire quantity ordered to be shipped is delivered to, and accepted by, the carrier for immediate shipment by it.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Anderson, Clayton & Co., Tex.Com.App., 246 S.W. 1031, reversing, Civ.App., 212 S.W. 814.

Separation of calves from cows

Where shipper had calves which he intended to ship and their mothers which he did not intend to ship inside railroad stock pens at 1 o'clock P. M., but did not separate cows from calves until later, railroad's liability as common carrier did not arise at 1 o'clock but only after cows had been separated from calves—Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Garrison, 38 P.2d 502, 169 Okl. 634.

The test

(1) The test as to whether property has been delivered to a carrier for immediate transportation is: Is there anything to be done by the shipper to effect the passage of complete possession or control to the carrier? If the shipper must perform some service or do some act

further act on the part of the shipper, then the liability of the carrier attaches at once.[80] After the carrier has received the goods for transportation it is liable as common carrier, not merely as warehouseman, although they have not yet been loaded for immediate carriage.[81]

The question of the delivery and acceptance of freight for immediate delivery is not controlled or affected by any delay on the carrier's part in placing the goods in transit;[82] and the circumstance that both parties knew and understood that the carrier had no cars ready for immediate shipment of the goods does not change the result, inasmuch as the goods are to be held merely for carriage, and are to be forwarded without further orders at the earliest practicable moment.[83]

b. Delivery with Directions to Hold until Further Orders

A delivery by a shipper with directions to hold until further orders is not such a delivery and acceptance as will render the carrier liable as such.

It is well settled that, where the carrier is directed by the shipper to do that which is incompatible with its common-law duty as carrier, as, for instance, not to forward the goods until further orders, there is no such delivery and acceptance as will render the carrier liable as such.[84] Under these circumstances it is liable only as an ordinary bailee, so long as such special instructions are operative.[85] Where the shipper revokes the order and gives orders to forward the goods, the liability as carrier immediately attaches.[86]

c. Failure to Give Shipping Directions

A carrier, although holding actual custody of the goods, does not become liable therefor as a common carrier until the reception of shipping directions or orders.

A well settled general rule, which is hardly more than a repetition of the preceding proposition, is that notwithstanding the goods are in the actual custody of the carrier, its liability as such does not attach before shipping directions have been given, and that its liability is that of a warehouseman only,[87] and while it would seem that this principle might be rendered inoperative by custom or special necessary to give this control over the entire shipment to the carrier, there is no such delivery.—Gulf, C & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Anderson, Clayton & Co., Tex.Com.App., 246 S.W. 1031, reversing, Civ.App., 212 S.W. 814.

(2) The rule has also been stated as follows: "The test as to whether the relation of shipper and carrier had been established is: Had the control and possession of the cotton been completely surrendered by the shipper to the railroad company? Whenever the control and possession of goods passes to the carrier and nothing remains to be done by the shipper, then it can be said with certainty that the relation of shipper and carrier has been established."—W. Addition to accepted shipment

Where goods are accepted, the subsequent placement of additional goods in the car does not relieve the carrier from liability.—Hines v. Steele, Tex.Civ.App., 224 S W. 606, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

On reshipment

Where a consignee refused to accept goods shipped and the shipper at the request of the carrier notified a local agent to have the goods returned, liability as a carrier attached at once, and the carrier is liable as such, and not as a warehouseman, for goods destroyed before reshipment actually began.—American Ry. Warehouseman or bailee

Evidence that a farmer, in accordance with an established custom, left a bale of cotton on a depot platform after having it weighed, with the consent of the railroad company, with the expectation of its being shipped at a later date, created a question for the jury whether or not the railroad company assumed the relation of warehouseman or bailee.—Parler v. contract, the implication that the carrier assumes the duty of immediate transportation and its responsibility of an insurer, without knowing to what place and to whom goods are to be shipped, must be clear.[88]

d. Failure to Prepay Freight

If prepayment of the freight is a provision of the contract of shipment, a carrier is not liable as an insurer until such payment is made.

If, by the provisions of the contract of shipment, prepayment of freight is required, the carrier cannot be held liable as insurer until payment of freight is made, notwithstanding its possession of the goods.[89] On the other hand, where the carrier is in possession of the goods as a carrier, it is liable as such, notwithstanding the freight has not been prepaid as agreed or the regulation of the interstate commerce commission requiring collection of freight rates on a prepaid consignment before it is forwarded.[90]

e. Issuance of Receipt or Bill of Lading

The issuance of a receipt or bill of lading is not necessary to complete delivery and acceptance between a shipper and carrier.

The liability of the carrier as common carrier begins with the actual delivery of the goods for transportation, and not merely with the formal execution of a receipt or bill of lading; the issuance of a bill of lading is not necessary to complete delivery and acceptance.[91] Even where it is provided by statute that liability commences with the issuance of the bill of lading, actual delivery and acceptance are sufficient to bind the carrier.[92] The Carmack amendment requiring the carrier to issue a bill of

Cotton owned by plaintiffs, which was destroyed by fire after it had been loaded by a compress company, at plaintiffs' request in cars of defendant railroad company, where the loading certificate issued by the compress company was held by plaintiffs, who had given no shipping directions to defendant and had made no application for a bill of lading, was held not in possession of defendant as carrier, and defendant was not liable as a carrier for the loss.—Harris, Cortner & Co. v. Agent's instructions

There can be an acceptance binding on a carrier notwithstanding a book of instructions to employees required the issuance of a receipt.—Dionne v. American Express Co., 101 A. 209, 91 Vt. 521.

Failure to lift bill

Where cotton was loaded on freight cars at place where carrier maintained no regularly appointed freight agent, and shipper made out bills of lading and deposited same in lock box at station, according to custom, and carrier had agreed to accept and transport cars when loaded, failure of freight conductor to lift bills of lading was immaterial to liability of carrier, where shipper had surrendered complete control of goods to carrier.—W. H. & C. B. Hodges v. Louisiana Ry. & Nav. Co., 156 So. 26, 180 La. 3.

Bill subsequently issued

Under the uniform bill of lading, defendant is not relieved from liability as a rail carrier, while goods are on board a lighter for lighterage across a harbor, so that the carrier is liable for destruction of the goods by fire while on board the lighter, and a bill of lading subsequently issued could not change the obligations assumed by the carrier on acceptance of the goods.—Charles J. Webb Sons Co. v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey, D.C.N.Y., 28 F.2d 392, affirmed, C.C.A., 36 F.2d 702.

lading for goods shipped but not providing that the carrier's liability will not attach until the bill of lading has been issued does not affect the operation of the rule.[93] The issuance of a bill of lading is, however, prima facie an acceptance of the goods by the carrier.[94]

§ 146. Authority of Carrier's Agent to Receive

Delivery of goods to an agent of the carrier, in order to charge the carrier with liability as a common carrier, must be to an agent with authority to act in such capacity.

A delivery of goods, for shipment, to an agent of the carrier who is duly authorized or clothed with apparent authority to receive them, and who has been accustomed to receive goods tendered for carriage, is a sufficient delivery to bind the carrier,[95] notwithstanding any general or special instructions given the agent of which the shipper is ignorant,[96] and, where by custom or usage the person to whom the goods are intrusted is one recognized by the carrier as the proper person to receive such goods for transportation, the carrier will be liable, no matter what particular relation the person may otherwise bear to the carrier.[97] On the other hand, delivery of goods for transportation, to one who is not the person ordinarily intrusted with the duty of receiving goods for transportation, is not such a delivery as will bind the carrier.[98] If there is a question as to whether the delivery in a particular instance was to the agent in his individual capacity, or as agent for his employer, then to charge the carrier it must appear that the goods were received by him with authority to act as agent of the employer, and with the understanding that he was acting in that capacity.[99]

The same person may act as agent for the carrier to receive, as well as agent for the shipper to deliver, and in such case the question of delivery will depend on whether or not such person has acted in the capacity of agent for the carrier in receiving.[1] The agent may have authority to receive at another place than that ordinarily designated for the receipt of goods, and if he does receive within the scope of his authority the carrier will be bound, although the place of receipt is not the place where goods are usually delivered for transportation.[2]

Particular agents. Ordinarily it is necessary in delivering goods to a railroad company as carrier that the goods be delivered at a station to an authorized agent;[3] but acceptance by a railroad station agent of freight tendered for transportation at the station will bind the carrier, since his authority will be presumed.[4] Such presumption, however, applies only when the goods are tendered at the station, the regular place for the reception of the goods, and does not exist where the tender is made at some other point, in which instance his authority must be clearly proved.[5] Where the station agent, without authority to receive certain goods, permitted the shipper to load them into a car and immediately telegraphed to headquarters for instructions, and was directed to refuse to receive the goods and at once informed the shipper, there is no acceptance for shipment.[6]

An express driver is the general agent of the carrier to collect goods for carriage;[7] but, if a parcel is placed in the custody of a driver to carry for his own gain, and not for the profit of his master, the master is not liable in case the parcel is not delivered.[8] A carrier by wagon who sends his team on his own business under the care of a driver who has never contracted for him and is without authority so to do is not liable for goods intrusted to the care of such driver.[9] A hotel porter who is accustomed to receive packages of a certain character for a railroad company is its agent for the acceptance of such packages, and a delivery thereof to him for transportation renders the carrier liable as such for their loss.[10]

§ 147. Custody and Control in Transit

Generally, the party with legal title to the goods is entitled to divert such goods at any time during transit, but this right ends when the carrier has fulfilled his obligation.

The true owner of goods transported by a common carrier or forwarding agent has the right to have his consignment while in transit withheld or diverted at any intermediate point through which it passes.[11] Instructions for a change in the destination of goods in transit must emanate from the party who is the real owner or one who has the authority to divert; otherwise the carrier alters the destination at its peril.[12] Such right of diversion, however, cannot add to the burden of the carrier or require it to do more than comply with a proper and legal demand therefor;[13] and, accordingly, a diversion of a shipment may be had during transit, but not after the destination has been reached, and the terms of the carrier's obligation have been fulfilled.[14] It is the duty of the carrier, on receipt

Duty to unload on order to withhold

A forwarding company, given an order to withhold shipment of goods which had been loaded with other goods in a car of which it still had control, was liable to the owner of the goods, where it failed to unload and withhold the same, where, although expense of unloading would be twenty dollars, an expense not out of proportion to the value of the goods.—Heath v. Judson Freight Forwarding Co., 190 P. 839, 47 Cal.App. 426

Issuance of exchange bill of lading

Where a carrier on diverting a shipment failed to rely on a rule giving it the right to refuse to divert and merely to act as plaintiff's agent in securing a bill of lading, but instead issued its own exchange bill of lading, it was bound by the new contract, and other contrary or equivocal terms of the original contract, if more favorable, were waived thereby.—W. L. Shepherd Lumber Co. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 112 So. 323, 216 Ala. 89.

New consideration unnecessary

A change in destination, being agreed on by a shipper and a carrier, does not require a new consideration to support it.—Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Reynolds, Tex.Civ.App., 33 S.W.2d 249—Davis v. Four Lakes Cattle Co., Tex.Civ.App., 245 S.W. 711.

Shipper may freely interrupt transportation and have shipment diverted or reconsigned, even after delivery to connecting carrier, or when it reaches destination originally named, notwithstanding Carmack-Cummins Amendment to Interstate Commerce Act, 49 U.S.C.A. § 20.—Southern Produce Co. v. Norfolk Southern R. Co., 132 S.E. 360, 144 Va. 422

Sufficient notice

A telegram to a forwarding company, "Hold shipment further instructions if not shipped wire my expense whether shipped or not," was sufficient notice to charge the forwarding company with the duty of withholding the goods from shipment.—Heath v. Judson Freight Forwarding Co., 190 P. 839, 47 Cal.App. 426.

Strangers to shipment

An unpaid seller to the shipper has been held to have no control over the goods, and the shipper alone has the lawful right to have the goods shipped and to require the carrier, under its duty toward shippers, to make out the bill of lading and forward the car according to instructions. Contracts of this character are not matters of private contract between carrier and shipper.—Wirch v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 222 N.W. 232, 197 Wis. 316

Express company rule

The rule of an express company providing for the diversion of a car while in transit does not apply, where the car has reached its destination before the shipper requests the local agent to divert it.—Willson v. American Ry. Express Co., 197 N.Y.S. 600, 204 App.Div. 59, affirmed 147 N.E. 196, 239 N.Y. 562 from the owner of an order to divert, to deliver them to such owner or divert them according to his orders, on his presenting evidence of ownership and paying the proper charges;[15] and, if the carrier complies with the owner's request to divert the shipment, it is of course not open to him thereafter to object to the failure to deliver according to the original contract.[16]

In the absence of anything to show the contrary the consignee is presumed to be the owner of the goods shipped,[17] and the carrier before complying with a demand for a diversion of the shipment by one not the consignee is entitled to be furnished with evidence of the ownership of the person making the request and, in case he fails or refuses to furnish it, he cannot complain thereafter of a refusal to divert the shipment.[18] As the consignee is presumptively the owner of the goods in transit, unless the carrier is advised that the shipper has retained title, the carrier is justified in complying with the consignee's request to deliver the goods at some other destination than that designated by the consignor and incurs no liability to the latter by so doing.[19] The fact that at the time he gives directions for a change in the route the goods have passed into the possession of a connecting carrier does not affect the owner's right to have his consignment, while in transit, held or diverted.[20] In the absence of a special contract, however, an initial carrier is not required to notify its connecting carriers that the owner or consignee of goods desires them diverted.[21]

A mere notification by the buyer to the carrier to divert the goods in course of transit and change the destination of the shipment does not constitute a taking of possession of the goods by the buyer, either actual or constructive.[22]

Form of request. Under the rule of the interstate-commerce commission that a request for diversion or reconsignment must be made or confirmed in writing, a shipper cannot recover for a carrier's failure to divert an interstate shipment pursuant to an oral request regardless of whether the shipment is of perishable products.[23]

§ 148. Title to Goods

Where a consignor has not reserved title in himself, on delivery of goods to a carrier it is generally held that title passes to the consignee, although the consignor may pass no greater right than he himself possesses. A carrier may not dispute the title of a consignor, but is not liable for surrender to a holder of a paramount title. A carrier, by reason of the special ownership accorded to bailees, may maintain actions against persons damaging or wrongfully taking the property, and may defend against parties claiming the goods without right.

In accordance with the general rules of sales that a delivery of goods by the seller to a carrier for shipment to the buyer is a delivery to the buyer, as discussed in C.J.S. title Sales §§ 164, 165, also p. 378 note 90, 55 C.J. p 367 note 40—and that it will be presumed that delivery by the seller to a carrier for transportation to the buyer passes title to the buyer, as discussed in C.J.S. title Sales § 259, also 55 C.J. p 560 note 90, the consignee designated in the bill of lading is presumptively the owner of the goods shipped;[24] and, in the absence of a bill

Consignee treated as owner
Consignee may for certain purposes be treated as owner.—Otis Staples Lumber Co. v. Federal Nat. Bank of Boston, 154 N.E. 545, 258 Mass. 182—Coleman v. New York, N. H. & H. Ry., 102 N.E. 92, 215 Mass. 45, 7 A.L.R. 1366

Inconsistent claim
Shippers could not treat a shipment of lumber over defendant carrier's line as having been sold by them to a certain person, and, as against the carrier, claim ownership of that shipment.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Williams, 97 So. 817, 210 Ala. 268.

Prima facie owner
Upon a shipment of goods through a carrier to a third person, and on delivery to the shipper of the bill of lading, the consignee is prima facie the owner of the property of lading,[25] or under an open bill of lading,[26] it is presumed that the title vests in the consignee absolutely on delivery of the goods to the carrier, subject only to the carrier's lien for freight, and the consignor's right of stoppage in transit. Therefore, in the absence of notice to the carrier of the existence of a different relation, it must treat the consignee as the owner of the goods, with authority to control them in transit.[27] By following the directions of the consignee, the carrier, in the absence of knowledge of consignee's lack of title, will not subject itself to any liability for losses which may result from so doing,[28] unless the directions involve the omission or nonperformance of some service or duty the performance of which is by law made essential in its transportation.[29] In the absence of a reservation of title by the consignor, the presumption of the passing of title to the consignee on delivery to the carrier will protect the carrier in delivering the goods to the consignee at the end of the transportation, as discussed in § 172 infra. If, however, before delivery to the consignee, the seller notifies the carrier not to deliver the goods, the carrier's duty then depends on the actual facts as to whether the relation between the consignor and the consignee is such that delivery to the carrier constitutes a transfer of title.[30] A purchaser from the consignee has been held to obtain no actual or constructive possession of goods in the hands of a carrier for transit.[31]

On the other hand, the consignor will be presumed to have retained the title if he has taken the bill of lading to himself or order,[32] or if the consignor

Right of possession

Where goods are delivered to a carrier to be transported to a consignee, he has the right of possession of the goods.—Buschow Lumber Co. v. Hines, 229 S.W. 451, 206 Mo.App. 681.

Reliance on description of goods

Where it is the evident intention of a consignee not to pay for goods prior to loading, the title to the goods does not pass to such purchasing consignee until possession is had by the carrier and such consignee is entitled to rely on the description of the goods contained in the bill of lading.—American Hide & Leather Co. v. Southern Ry. Co., 142 N.E. 200, 310 Ill. 524, affirming 228 Ill.App. 305.

Shipment to consignee in care of another

Where goods are consigned to one person in care of another, the title to the goods, as a general rule, is in the consignee.—Emmons Coal Mining Co. v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., C.C.A.Pa., 3 F.2d 525, affirming, D.C., Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Emmons Coal Mining Co., 287 F. 168, and affirmed 47 S.Ct. 254, 272 U.S. 709, 71 L.Ed. 485.

26. N.C.—Aydlett v. Norfolk-Southern R. Co., 89 S.E. 1000, 172 N.C. 47.

Assignment of goods

Since a consignee possesses title to goods upon their delivery to the carrier, the shipper of goods under a straight bill of lading cannot assign the right to such goods to another, but may assign only the right which it owns, a claim for payment for goods shipped.—State Bank of De Pere v. Chicago & N.W. Ry. Co., 248 N.W. 423, 211 Wis. 465.

10 C.J. p. 228 note 37.

Evidence of ownership

The fact that a person is consignee of shipments by carrier is some evidence that he is the owner of the goods.—New York Cent. & H.R.R. Co. v. York & Whitney Co., 119 N.E. 855, 230 Mass. 206, affirmed in part and reversed in part on other grounds 41 S.Ct. 509, 256 U.S. 406, 65 L.Ed. 1016.

Shipping instructions not limited to shipper

Provision in shipping contract for ventilation of carload of bananas "on special instructions" did not imply that instructions should be received only from shipper, or warrant carrier in ignoring later reasonable instructions by consignee as apparent owner necessitated by change of temperature or weather conditions.—Saunders Bros. v. Carrier liable to shipper where title reserved

Where plaintiff, under an executory contract of sale, loaded apples in a freight car with the consent of the railroad company, and notified the latter that title remained in plaintiff until payment by the buyer, the railroad company was liable to plaintiff for damages for refusing to deliver apples to plaintiff upon demand, such a refusal amounting to conversion.—Wilson v. International Ry. Co., 160 N.Y.S. 367, affirmed 164 N.Y.S. 1118.

Order notify bill

A shipment of goods to a buyer

or his agent takes control of the goods at the point of destination;[33] and, if the shipper retains the right to dispose of and control the goods, the title remains in him even though they have been delivered to the carrier for the consignee.[34] Of course, where there has been no sale, the title to goods shipped remains in the consignor notwithstanding delivery to the carrier,[35] and the mere fact that goods have been shipped to a person is of itself insufficient to vest title thereto in him.[36] The shipper may also show that the goods were shipped on consignment or that by agreement the title had revested in him so that he may be entitled to recover for damage to the goods,[37] and if, under the controlling statute, title has not passed, the shipper may have a right of action against the carrier for a loss of the goods during transit.[38] If the consignor ships goods to a factor or other agent in pursuance of a previous agreement so to do, but the factor or agent has made no advances on the strength of the delivery of the goods to the carrier for him, then his right to the goods has not yet attached, and the consignor may change their direction or countermand the order for delivery,[39] but if the right of the consignee to the goods has become complete on their delivery to the carrier, the consignor cannot by notice or direction to the carrier prevent such delivery.[40]

Where a carrier receives money for transmission but is unable to make delivery, the sale of a credit is not a complete transaction at the date of receipt, and the company does not become the owner of the money paid for such credit.[41]

Carrier cannot question consignor's title. The general rule is that a carrier, like any other bailee, is not at liberty to dispute the title of the consignor from whom it receives articles of shipment in an action brought by him,[42] the reason usually assigned being that, if the contrary doctrine prevailed, the carrier might by setting up title in some third person keep the property for itself.[43] However, the rule is subject to exceptions and the carrier will not render itself liable to the consignor where it actually surrenders the goods to the owner of the paramount title, as shown in § 172; and if the under an order notify bill of lading reserves title in the seller and such title can pass to the buyer only on delivery of the bill of lading.

Assumption of ownership

A carrier which has no knowledge to the contrary can assume that the party in possession of the goods delivered to it for transportation is the owner or is authorized to consign the goods for shipment, and if it receives and delivers the goods in accordance with the directions of such person without knowledge of any other claim, it is not liable as for conversion to the true owner, so that an owner of an interest in oil land, who was out of possession, cannot charge a pipe line company with conversion of oil received from the persons in possession of the land, and delivered by it to the consignee before the company had any knowledge of plaintiff's claim to the land.—Hall v. Cumberland Pipe Line Co., 237 S.W. 405, 193 Ky. 728.

Bailor need not prove title

Where a shipper suing a carrier in detinue for miscarried goods was in possession of the goods and alone lays claim to them, and shipped them consigned to himself, the relation of bailor and bailee exists between them, and the rule that the depositary is bound to redeliver or restore chattels bailed to bailor, and that bailor may recover them of his bailee without proving his right of property in them, applies.—Louisville & N.R. Co. v. James, 93 So. 701, 208 Ala. 6.

transaction is such as to import a transfer of title to the consignee, a delivery may be made to the consignee without imposing any liability on behalf of the consignor on the carrier.[44] Likewise, the carrier derives from the shipper no higher right with reference to possession of the goods than that which the shipper has, and in case of wrongful delivery to the carrier without authority the real owner may assert his rights as against the carrier[45] A carrier of goods is also without right to require an indemnity bond as a condition precedent to the delivery of property to its true owner;[46] but a consignee may be required by the carrier to give satisfactory indemnity on delivery to him, when the consignor's possession was wrongful and the carrier received notice thereof through a claim of ownership by a third person.[47] Also, if the carrier received the property for transportation in good faith without knowledge that the property was its own and thereafter discovered that the property belonged to it, it may avail itself of the defense that the property belonged to it in an action of conversion with the same force and effect that it could have availed itself of the right of a true owner in case of a third person.[48]

Rights and duties of carrier. A carrier, like any other bailee, has by reason of its rightful possession a special ownership of or title to the property as against third persons which will sustain an action for damage to the property or to recover possession thereof if wrongfully taken from it.[49] It may likewise maintain an action to recover possession of the goods where the goods have been delivered to the wrong person, or where they have been delivered to the right person without performance of proper conditions precedent to delivery, but in the latter instance it can do so only on paying back to the person to whom delivery is made all charges paid by him.[50] Also the carrier has such interest in the goods as to authorize it to defend against a person claiming it without right, and it is its duty to insist on its right where such person seeks to seize the goods.[51] The right of the carrier to possession does not, however, give it authority to dispose of the goods as against the rightful owner or to pledge them,[52] except as under emergency it may have implied authority as representative of the owner to sell, as discussed heretofore in § 48.

Since there can be no lawful delivery by and redelivery to a carrier en route, a carrier is in either actual or constructive possession of goods shipped until they reach their destination, even though temporarily sidetracked to permit a shipper's inspection.[53] And the same rule applies where goods are

The mere fact that a railroad had previously delivered cotton to a buyer on forged bills of lading does not prevent the railroad from recovering from such buyer the value of the cotton delivered on a forged bill of lading purporting to have been issued by a connecting carrier, on the ground that the buyer was misled by the negligence of the railroad.—Hubbard Bros. & Co. v. Carrier not relieved under unlawful agreement

A carrier is not relieved from liability for ore stolen from car placed on siding en route for sampling of temporarily sidetracked to permit them to be reconditioned.[54]

§ 149. Stoppage in Transitu

Stoppage in transit may be had by one who is legally entitled to the goods or property, after reasonable notice, but only while such goods or property are in the possession of the carrier.

The right of the seller of goods sold on credit and which have been delivered to the carrier for the purchaser, in case the purchaser becomes insolvent before the carrier has delivered the goods to him, to prevent such delivery by notice to the carrier and to retake possession pertains to the law of sales, and is discussed in the C.J.S. title Sales § 403 et seq, also 55 C.J. p 907 note 2 et seq, and consequently need not be considered here. Only the duties of the carrier which arise from the giving of such notice will be considered at this point.

A carrier is entitled to insist on a full investigation as to a shipper's right to stoppage in transit and to retain possession until satisfied,[55] as only the legal owner of the goods[56] or his agent[57] has the right of stoppage in transit.

In some jurisdictions the right to stoppage in transit is controlled entirely by statute,[58] and under some statutes it is not a privilege to be granted or withheld at the will of the carrier.[59] A state transit commission's action in requiring the right of stoppage in transit to be granted to an intra-state shipment is not unconstitutional, nor does it interfere with the management of the carrier.[60]

Notice to carrier. Notice of stoppage in transit need not be in any specific form; it is enough if the carrier or its agent is advised of the wish of the vendor that his goods should not be delivered to the vendee on account of his insolvency.[61] The notice, however, must be reasonable and such as to enable the carrier to advise its agent in charge of the goods, or who is to deliver them to the vendee, that such delivery shall not be made.[62] According-ore, since the carrier's agreement to leave car on siding temporarily en route for shipper's accommodation, not being authorized by uniform bill of lading, was unlawful under Elkins Act § 1, Interstate Commerce Act §§ 3, 6, and Hepburn Act § 2.—Siebert v. Erie R. Co., 179 N.Y.S. 136, 189 App.Div. 586.

Estoppel of carrier's claim

Carrier, having in violation of law granted shipper of silver ore special privilege of having car placed on siding en route for sampling of ore, could not complain, in shipper's action to recover for theft, after separation from rest of ore, that the stolen ore constituted articles of extraordinary value, within § 6 of the uniform bill of lading, providing for a higher rate therefor, and had not been so classified, since the increased value was due to separation in process of sampling, made possible by carrier's unlawful agreement.—Siebert v. Erie R. Co., 179 N.Y.S 136, 189 App.Div. 586.

54. Where goods are damaged while in the hands of a carrier and are returned to the shipper for reconditioning without a surrender of the bill of lading and are destroyed by fire while in the shipper's actual possession, the constructive possession is in the carrier and the liability for their loss falls on such carrier.—Curtis Tire & Rubber Co. v. Goodrich Transit Co., 203 N.W. 522, 230 Mich 598.

Unwarranted refusal a conversion

Where plaintiff loaded apples in freight cars after notifying defendant railroad company that title remained in him until payment by buyer, and thereafter demanded a return of the apples on the buyer's failure to pay, the carrier, as bailee, had a right to defer delivery for a reasonable time to investigate title to such property, but its refusal thereafter was a conversion.—Wilson v. Statement that buyer is insolvent

Where the statement of claim avers delivery to a carrier and order to stop the goods in transit accepted by the carrier and the carrier's negligent failure to comply therewith, a judgment on the affidavit of defense raising a question of law was improperly entered, on the ground that the stoppage order failed to state, as required by statute, that the buyer was insolvent and had not paid the seller for the goods.—Teller & Co v. American Railway Express Co., 78 Pa Super. 300.

Reasonable information in notice

The right of stoppage in transit can be exercised only by one who has sold goods on credit to a buyer who is or becomes insolvent, and it is not unreasonable that a carrier before it undertakes to obey such an order should have notice that the sale was on credit, that is, that the goods had not been paid for, and that the buyer was insolvent. Both conditions are

ly, where the carrier or its agent understands the object of the notice which is to exercise the right of the vendor to stop goods while in transit and before delivery and is satisfied with it when given, the carrier cannot thereafter object that the notice was insufficient, whether or not in fact it was sufficient.[63]

On receipt of a notice which complies with the requirements relating thereto, it is the duty of the carrier to return the goods to the owner, or to divert the goods according to his instructions, and in so doing it incurs no liability to the consignee.[64] The carrier, however, must deliver the goods to the person entitled to them, and on the exercise of the right the carrier acts at its peril in its disposition of the goods stopped.[65] If the carrier allows the consignee by direct or indirect means to get possession of the goods after the consignor has exercised the right of stoppage in transit, liability to the consignor will result.[66] The consignor's right of action for damages is in no way affected by the fact that he failed to tender the bill of lading, where there was no demand for the bill of lading, or denial of the consignor's ownership, the refusal being based on the ground of inability to comply with the consignor's demand.[67]

The mere fact that the carrier transported the goods to the city of their destination after receiving notice to stop does not constitute a conversion where the goods were not delivered to the consignee.[68]

Termination of the right. Ordinarily the right of a consignor to stoppage in transit remains so long as the goods are in the possession of the carrier[69] and not afterward.[70] In other words, as be-necessary to justify a stoppage of goods in transit, and it is not unreasonable that the notice of the seller's claim to exercise his right should set them forth—Teller & Co. v. American Railway Express Co., 78 Pa Super. 300.

Sufficiency of notice

(1) Consignor's letter to carrier stating, "we will thank you to hold up delivery until you receive our telegraphic instructions," has been held to be a sufficient notice to stop delivery.—Phillips-Patterson Co. v. Northwestern R. Co. of South Carolina, 93 S E 868, 108 S.C. 166.

(2) Telegram and letter conveying notice of stoppage in transit was sufficient to apprise carrier of authenticity, although bearing only typewritten signature—Interstate Window Glass Co. v. New York, N. H. & H R Co., 133 A. 102, 104 Conn. 342.

Sufficient statement of claim

Where a statement of claim alleges that a carrier in an interstate shipment made delivery to the consignee notwithstanding notice of a stoppage in transit, the statement sets forth a case sufficient to go to a jury, and it is error under such circumstances to enter judgment for the defendant on the question of law—Teller & Co v. tween the carrier and a vendor seeking to exercise the right of stoppage in transitu, there must have been an actual or a constructive delivery by the carrier to the consignee in order to cut off the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu;[71] but it is also well settled that a sale of the goods by the consignee, by means of transfer of a negotiable bill of lading to a bona fide purchaser for value while the goods are in transit, will terminate the right of stoppage in transit,[72] and this may cause difficulty with the carrier which has no notice of such transfer. If the carrier refuses, although under the seller's order, to deliver to such third person, it may be liable for subsequent loss by reason of a falling market.[73] However, if no negotiable document of title is transferred by the buyer, the right of stoppage in transit for insolvency of the buyer is not lost by a resale of the goods while in transit.[74] The right of stoppage in transit is not impaired or extinguished by service of process of garnishment on the carrier.[75] Where goods are delivered pending a right of inspection, they are subject to stoppage in transit since legally they are still in transit.[76]

Effect on carrier's lien. The lien of the carrier for charges on the goods is prior to the vendor's right to repossession under stoppage in transit, and the carrier may retain its possession until such charges are paid,[77] but the carrier as against the right of the consignor to retake possession in the event of stoppage in transit cannot enforce the payment of charges for other shipments.[78]

§ 150. Custody and Control of Goods Awaiting Transportation

If a carrier receives goods for transportation, it is liable therefor as a common carrier while the goods are awaiting transportation.

As stated in § 145, where goods are delivered to a carrier for immediate transportation and nothing remains to be done by the shipper, the liability of the carrier as such attaches at once, and even while detained in the carrier's warehouse, or pens, or on its platforms in the usual course of business, or for the carrier's convenience, the liability of the carrier is not that of warehouseman, but that of carrier proper.[79] However, if the goods are detained by the carrier before commencement of actual transportation at the request of the consignor and for his accommodation, or in order that something further

Attempted preservation of right after delivery denied

Directions to bank, accompanying draft with bill of lading attached, requiring surrender of documents upon drawee's acceptance of draft payable thirty days after arrival of car, was not sufficient to show intent of drawer to preserve right of stoppage in transit—New York, N H & H R Co v. Mere arrival of goods at a fixed terminus does not necessarily end transit and thus bar the right to stoppage in transit, for the goods may be in the possession of the carrier or an intermediate bailee—Angelina County Lumber Co. v. Michigan Cent R Co, 252 Ill.App. 82

Forwarding order

Under the tariff regulations of a railroad company, providing that carload shipments arriving at its general New York terminal and there held for further directions, after a stated term, should be subject to demurrage charges, and the liability of the company therefor should be that of warehouseman only, where a car was so held, the liability of the company as carrier reattached on its receipt of an order for forwarding the shipment—Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. John Lysaght, Limited, C C A.N Y, 271 F. 906, affirming, D.C., John Lysaght v. Lehigh Valley R. Co, 254 F. 351, certiorari denied Lehigh Valley R. Inspection by carrier's agent

Where carrier requested that cotton be inspected and inspection certificate issued before it was shipped, and where inspector, pursuant to a custom, sealed cars inspected by him and delivered to carrier a certificate of inspection, after which shipper had nothing to do with transit, the inspector was carrier's employee so as to render the carrier liable for loss of the goods after delivery to it—St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Blocker, 184 P. 584, 76 Okl 279

Storage for carrier's convenience

Where carrier agreed to pack and ship goods within a specified time, which for its convenience were stored in warehouse, where they were destroyed by fire, it was immaterial whether liability was that of carrier or warehouseman—Beall v. Bekins Van & Storage Co, 166 P. 370, 33 Cal. App. 652.

may be done to prepare the goods for transportation,[80] or where the goods are delivered to the carrier without shipping directions,[81] or to be held until freight charges are paid,[82] the carrier's liability during such detention is that of warehouseman only, and ordinary care for the safekeeping of the goods is the measure of the carrier's responsibility.

§ 151. Custody and Control of Goods Stopped in Transitu

A carrier, holding goods under an order of stoppage in transit, is liable as a warehouseman only.

If, by the orders of one entitled to such action, the goods are stopped in transit, and are held for such person, the carrier while so holding is liable as warehouseman only.[83]

§ 152. Custody and Control of Goods Awaiting Delivery to Consignee

Except while goods are in the control of an owner or his agent, a carrier's liability as such continues until the completion of transportation.

A carrier is liable as such until transportation is completed, and, accordingly, so long as anything remains to be done by the carrier as carrier, before the goods are ready for acceptance by the consignee, the carrier's liability as such continues.[84] This principle is subject to an important qualifi-

Carrier not liable for unguarded car
A carrier, as warehouseman, need not guard all loaded cars on sidings prior to transportation.—Marsh v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 167 S.E. 274, 159 Va. 694.

Implied agreement to hold as warehouseman
Where cotton was delivered to carrier to be held until number delivered had reached one hundred bales before shipment was to be made, there was an implied agreement that such cotton should be held by carrier as warehouseman until remaining cotton was delivered.—Rio Grande City Ry. Co. v. Guerra, Tex.Civ.App., 26 S.W.2d 360.

No duty prior to delivery to carrier
A carrier cannot be held for loss of hogs from eating poison found on premises adjoining its shipping pens, but not under its control, where a dipping vat for stock was in operation, and on which premises the hogs strayed while in the shipper's possession and before delivery, or tender to the carrier, the carrier under such circumstances owing the shipper no duty either to keep such premises free from poison or to prevent the hogs from reaching the same, and the care taken by the shipper and his agents to prevent the hogs from eating the poison not being material.—Lancaster v. Recall of directions
If the shipper, even after complete delivery to the carrier for immediate transportation, recalls his directions as to immediate shipment and requests the carrier to postpone the transportation for a designated time, the liability of the carrier changes from that of a common carrier to that of a warehouseman only on the request by the shipper and a compliance therewith. Under these circumstances, if the goods are destroyed after such a request has been granted, the carrier is not liable except on proof of negligence.—St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Montgomery, 39 Ill. 335.

Shipment prevented by injunction

Delivery incomplete
Where delivery of cotton by a carrier to a compress company as agent of the consignee's assignee was not complete when the cotton was destroyed by fire, the carrier is liable as such rather than as a warehouseman.—Texas & N. O R. Co. v. Wrenn, Tex.Civ.App., 69 S.W.2d 156, error refused.

Final transfer by carrier
Where goods were consigned to place in Texas, care of third person, "not for purpose of delivery," ultimate delivery being to consignee in Mexico, and it was the custom of the carrier after goods had been changed to Mexican car to transfer them across border to carrier in Mexico, payment of freight and notice to carrier by consignee that he had transferred goods to Mexican car was sufficient to render carrier liable, as a carrier, and not as warehouseman for negligent delay in transporting the car whereby goods were destroyed by fire, no formal acceptance being necessary.—Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co v. La Tolteca Cia de Cemento Portland, S A., Tex.Civ.App., 204 S.W. 1016.

Loss before lapse of time for removal
(1) Under bill of lading providing that "property not removed" within forty-eight hours after notice of arrival may be kept in car subject to reasonable charge for storage and carrier's liability as warehouseman only, carrier was liable as carrier for loss of goods within forty-eight hours after notice, although consignee broke seals, accepted shipment, and began unloading.—Mark Owen & Co. v. Michigan Cent. R Co., 125 N.E. 767, 291 Ill. 149, certiorari granted Michigan Cent. R Co v. Mark Owen & Co., 40 S.Ct. 483, 253 U.S. 481, 64 L.Ed. 1023, and affirmed 41 S.Ct. 554, 256 U.S. 427, 65 L.Ed. 1032.

(2) In suit by consignee's assignee against railroad whose bill of lading provided that its liability should be that of warehouseman only for cotton destroyed by fire occurring after expiration of free time allowed by its tariffs for unloading, evidence showed that such free time had not expired when cotton was destroyed by fire and, hence, carrier was liable as such.—Texas & N. O R. Co. v. Wrenn, Tex.Civ.App., 69 S.W.2d 156, error refused.

cation. It contemplates that, after the goods are once committed to the carrier, its possession and control over them continues over every mile of the route, and during every hour of the time until the arrival of the goods at the point of destination. Therefore, where at some point on the journey the goods are by agreement of the owner temporarily out of the possession and control of the carrier, and where the same are actually in the possession of the owner or some one as his agent, the relation of the carrier to the goods is not that of an insurer, and if the goods are, without its fault, destroyed while so out of its possession, the carrier cannot be held responsible.[85]

Storing; placing on sidetrack. Railroads usually have freight houses in which the goods are placed on reaching their destination, and in the absence of some contract or usage by which the consignee is bound to unload from the cars, their liability as carrier is not reduced to that of warehouseman until the goods are placed in the freight house, ready to be taken by the consignee;[86] but where the carrier is not required or expected in the usual course of business to remove the freight from the cars, as in the case of grain in bulk, coal, lumber, and the like, delivery of the car in a safe and convenient position for unloading at the elevator, warehouse, or other place designated by the contract or required in the usual course of business, or where no place of delivery is thus designated or required, on its sidetrack in the usual and customary place for unloading by consignees, together with notice to the consignee and a reasonable time allowed for the removal in those jurisdictions where this is necessary, terminates the liability of the carrier as such,[87] although it still continues liable as warehouseman, as is discussed in § 156 infra. Nevertheless, even under these circumstances, it is the duty of the carrier to place the car in a reasonably safe and accessible place for unloading, and, until it does so, the carrier's liability as such continues.[88] Storage of goods by a carrier, in case of an extraordinary interruption of service, before reaching its destination reduces the carrier's liability to that of a warehouseman, following notice of such action given to the consignee.[89] Delivery to the consignee's private tracks is a sufficient delivery to release the carrier from liability as such, as to the cars delivered.[90] This is so although the delivery was subject to the right of inspection. Such a delivery nevertheless places the cars under the dominion of the consignee, and the carrier thereafter has no right to interfere with that dominion unless on inspection the consignee rejected the cars and notified the carrier of that fact.[91] However, in the case of goods shipped under an order notify bill of lading, the unauthorized placement of the goods on a siding is a mere tender of delivery, not justifying an unlawful seizure by the consignee.[92]

Rules specially applicable to express companies. The general rule is that the liability of an express company as a common carrier does not end until it has made or tendered a personal delivery of the goods to the consignee or owner, or to some person authorized by him to receive them,[93] but if by reason of inability to find the consignee, or the consignee's refusal to receive the goods, delivery is not completed, the carrier is liable only for safekeeping as bailee for hire.[94]

At owner's risk

Where cotton was shipped by plaintiff for delivery to its agent, a compress company, on its track, such track was a private or other siding within provision of bill of lading that property delivered on private or other siding should be at owner's risk after cars are detached from trains.—Georgia Cotton Co. v. § 153. Notice of Arrival of Goods and Reasonable Time to Remove Goods

a. Express companies
b. Other common carriers

a. Express Companies

Where the general rule requiring express companies to deliver goods transported to the consignee's residence or place of business has been dispensed with, the consignee is entitled to notice of arrival and a reasonable time to remove before the carrier's liability ceases and it becomes liable as a warehouseman only.

Where by usage, custom, or special contract, the general rule discussed in § 152 requiring the delivery at the place of business or at the residence of the consignee is dispensed with, the consignee is in all cases entitled to notice of the arrival of the goods and a reasonable time thereafter in which to remove them before the carrier's liability as insurer ceases and that of warehouseman attaches [95] However, when the goods have been transported safely to their destination, and the consignee has been notified of their arrival and a reasonable opportunity has been allowed him to remove them, the liability of the express company thereafter is that of a warehouseman [96] Special instructions on the shipping tag of express packages for notification of the consignee are not binding on an express company, operating under the rules and regulations of the interstate commerce commission, since such regulations are controlling on both parties to the shipping contract.[97]

(1) Notice of Arrival

(a) Necessity
(b) Requisites and sufficiency of notice
(c) Circumstances excusing notice

(a) Necessity

Although not required in some jurisdictions or under contracts dispensing therewith, notice of arrival of goods must usually be given the consignee and a reasonable time allowed for removal before the carrier's liability as such will be terminated.

It is the general rule that the carrier's liability as such does not terminate nor its less stringent liability as warehouseman commence until notice has been given to the consignee of the arrival of the goods,[98] and, as discussed in subsection b (2) of this section, a reasonable time after such notice for removal of the goods has elapsed. The rule has been held to apply, although the consignee knew the probable date of shipment and the probable date of arrival,[99] and it has been further held that consignees of freight, even though it is of perishable nature, are not bound to make inquiry at the office of the carrier therefor in the absence of notice of arrival, and that too, although they have reason to

Intention of parties

Actions
(1) Under a statute providing that a carrier shall give notice of arrival of goods to the consignee and, on failure to do so, it shall be held to pay to the person injured thereby the actual amount of damages so sustained, a consignee must sue within the time allotted by statute.—Missouri Pac R Co v. Armstrong, 44 S.W.2d 1093, 184 Ark 1076.

(2) Such cause of action accrues as of the time when it came to the consignee's notice that he had not been notified of such arrival.—Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Armstrong, supra.

Notice under freight bill provision
Where a freight bill provided for notice of arrival to be given a designated party, notice to such party was sufficient, and thereafter the carrier held the goods as a warehouseman.—Texas & N.O. Ry. Co. v. Patterson & Roberts, Tex.Civ.App., 192 S.W. 585.

The basis for this rule is that it is unreasonable to insist that the consignee shall be in constant attendance on the carrier's office to ascertain whether the goods have arrived.—Moses v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 32 N.H. 523, 64 Am.D. 381.

99. Mich.—Walters v. Detroit United R. Co., 102 N.W. 745, 139 Mich. 303.

believe that the shipment is overdue.[1]

In other jurisdictions following the so called "Massachusetts rule," it is held that when the goods have reached their destination and are placed in a position of reasonable safety, ready for delivery to the consignee, the carrier's duty as a carrier terminates without regard to notice to the consignee.[2] In still other jurisdictions, although the consignee is allowed a reasonable time in which to remove goods before the carrier's liability as such ceases, the view is taken that the consignee is not entitled to notice of the arrival of the goods, but is bound to take notice of such arrival, and has only a reasonable time thereafter in which to remove them regardless of notice.[3] In such jurisdictions a carrier's unauthorized and wrongful removal of goods from their place of destination, after delivery there, imposes on it the duty to notify the owner of the probable date of return thereto, and an omission of such duty subjects the carrier to absolute liability for loss occurring between the dates of their return and the owner's knowledge thereof,[4] and to make the general rule again applicable such notice must be given.[5] A limitation of the principle allowing reasonable time but making no provision for notice is also recognized in cases where the goods do not arrive on time. In these circumstances it is held that the carrier's liability as such does not terminate until notice is given to the consignee of the arrival of the goods;[6] and, of course, the rule has no application where the contract for transportation specially requires notice, as discussed later in this section.

A statute requiring the mailing of notice to the consignee has been held to have no application where the carrier's liability, either as such or as a warehouseman, had terminated by delivery to the consignee.[7]

Under contract requiring notice. The duty of the carrier as to giving notice may be controlled by contract between the shipper and the carrier.[8] Where notice is provided for by contract the requirements of the contract in this regard must be complied with, and it makes no difference whether or not notice is required by common law or by statute in the jurisdiction where the contract is made,[9] and, on the other hand, there is a corresponding duty on the part of the consignee to put himself in a position to receive the notice.[10]

Under contract dispensing with notice. Where a bill of lading provides that, in case packages are consigned to a station which has no agent, the shipper authorizes the carrier on arrival of the train by day or by night to deposit the goods on the platform, whether there is anyone there to receive them or not, and that the shipper agrees that the carrier's liability shall end on such deposit which shall be considered a delivery to the consignee, no notice of arrival of the goods is required.[11] A delay of fifty minutes in the arrival of such train will not operate to take the case out of the provisions of the contract and render a notice necessary.[12]

(b) Requisites and Sufficiency of Notice

Notice, if necessary, must be given to the consignee or his agent in a manner which definitely and sufficiently informs him of the arrival of his goods. Such notice should be promptly given, unless the time of giving notice is prescribed by statute, in which case compliance must be had therewith.

The notice must be given to the consignee or to his duly authorized agent,[13] unless the shipper is also consignee and designates a person whom the carrier is to notify at the place of delivery, in which case, if notice is given to such person, notice to the Notice to shipper insufficient under a bill of lading consigning goods to shipper's order and requiring notice to be given to shipper's agent at destination.—Missouri & N. A. R. Co. v. United Farmers of America, 292 S.W. 990, 173 Ark. 577.

shipper consignee is not necessary.[14] An original consignee, however, who has surrendered his right, title, and interest to the goods, is not entitled to notification of arrival from the carrier.[15]

The notice must be in writing if a statute so provides;[16] but in the absence of such requirement a verbal notice will suffice.[17] A mere newspaper publication is not sufficient.[18] In the absence of statute, personal service on the consignee is not necessary; the sending of notice to the consignee through the mail will ordinarily satisfy the requirements of the rule,[19] although the mailing of notice to the place of delivery where the consignee was known not to be doing business and where the notice would not be received will not suffice.[20]

Where the consignee's address appears on the billing, or is known, notification of arrival of shipment must be given at that address.[21] If, however, the consignee's address is not known, the carrier is not bound to look for him at any place other than that of destination.[22]

It is not incumbent on the carrier to give notice that goods must be removed in a particular time, or to give notice that a charge will be made for storage, unless the goods are promptly removed before its liability as an insurer can cease.[23] Notice of the receipt of a class of goods altogether different from those which the consignee expected and which it had ordered is insufficient, and the consignee is excused from paying any attention to such notice.[24] Notice of a right of inspection under an "order notify" bill of lading need not be given.[25]

A consignee, having failed within the allotted time to object to the sufficiency of notice of arrival of goods, is not allowed afterward to claim that it was insufficient.[26] Ordinarily the burden of proof is on the carrier to show notice in order to relieve itself of liability as insurer, but notice may be presumed without proof where the course of dealing between the parties is one under which the carrier always gave notice.[27]

Time of giving notice. Notice of arrival of the goods must be given within the time, if any, prescribed by statute[28] or by the rules of the interstate commerce commission, if the shipment is subject thereto.[29] In any event prompt notice should be given, especially where the goods are of perishable nature.[30] A notice written before but not mailed until after the goods were destroyed is, of course, insufficient;[31] and so is a notice given on the morning of the arrival of the goods at their destination stating that the car would be delivered in the usual course of business.[32] Under a statute providing that a carrier shall be liable only as warehouseman after it has used due diligence to notify the consignee of the arrival of the goods, what is due diligence depends on the circumstances of the case.[33]

(c) Circumstances Excusing Notice

A carrier may be excused from giving notice of arrival under circumstances which show actual knowledge of arrival on the part of the consignee or indicate an impossibility of giving such notice for which the carrier is not responsible.

Circumstances may exist which will excuse the carrier from giving notice. The carrier is excused from giving notice to the consignee, even when required so to do by statute, when the consignee is already aware of the arrival of the goods.[34] Since no rule requires a carrier to do what by the exercise of due effort it cannot do,[35] provided due diligence is used under the circumstances,[36] the absence of notice is also excused where the consignee has no residence or place of business at the point to which the goods are sent, and his address is unknown to the carrier and cannot be ascertained by the exercise of due diligence,[37] or where a shipment is not properly addressed to the consignee's usual place of business.[38] Under these circumstances the carrier can place the goods in its warehouse, and after keeping them a reasonable time, if the consignee does not call for them, its liability as carrier ceases and it remains liable simply as a warehouseman[39] Notice is also excused where the consignee's place of business was closed on account of the day on which the goods arrived being a holiday,[40] or where the consignee had not called for his mail and would not have received the notice if it had been given.[41]

(2) Time of Removal

The consignee must use diligence in removing goods after their arrival, or, where he is entitled to notice of their arrival, after such notice has been given.

Because of the exceptional and arbitrary character of the insurance feature of the contract of carriage, it necessarily follows that the consignee is bound to observe diligence in removing the goods.[42] The duty of the consignee to receive the goods, it is said, is as imperative as is the duty of the carrier to deliver. The stringent liability of the carrier cannot be continued at the option or to suit the convenience of the consignee.[43] Where the parties by the contract between them have set a limit on the time within which the consignee is to remove the goods, such as a provision in the bill of lading that the goods are to be removed within forty-eight hours after notice of arrival, the extraordinary liability of the carrier terminates with the expiration of that time,[44] notwithstanding it was raining dur-

Where a carrier misaddressed a notice of arrival of goods, but the consignee later received notice through the warehouse in which such goods had been stored, the carrier is excused from giving notice and the consignee may not recover for loss to the goods caused by his negligence in not obtaining them from the warehouse within a reasonable time.—Hunt v. ing part of that time, at least where a reasonable time to remove the goods remained after the rain stopped and before the expiration of the time fixed;[45] but the consignee is entitled to such time in which to remove the goods, and during that time the carrier is at least bound to use reasonable diligence to protect it from injury.[46]

In the absence of an express stipulation in the agreement of carriage referring thereto, a conflict prevails as to the right of a consignee to have a reasonable time in which to remove goods after their arrival.

Under the so-called Massachusetts doctrine which now prevails in that state and several others, when the goods have reached their destination and are placed in a position of reasonable safety, ready for delivery to the consignee, the carrier's duty as carrier terminates and that of warehouseman begins without regard to a reasonable time for the removal of the goods.[47] In other jurisdictions, however, irrespective of whether or not the consignee is entitled to notice of the arrival of his goods, when the goods have arrived at their destination, the liability of the carrier as such continues until the consignee or his agent has had a reasonable time in which to remove them.[48]

From what period time computed. Where notice of the arrival of the goods must be given the consignee, or where notice is specially provided for in the shipping contract, the reasonable time in which such goods must be removed commences to run only after such notice is given the consignee of the arrival of the goods, or after actual knowledge by him of such arrival.[49] Under a uniform bill of lading, allowing forty-eight hours for removal after notice of arrival of goods, such period begins to run from the time notice is properly mailed to the owner,[50] and a notice given before a shipment reaches the point of delivery is insufficient to start the running of such period.[51]

What constitutes a reasonable time for the removal of goods will in general depend on the circumstances of each particular case,[52] unless the

Consignee must be diligent in removal of goods

If a consignee who has received notice of arrival of goods wishes to hold the carrier liable as such for loss by fire, it is incumbent upon him at least to use diligence in removing the goods—American Express Co. v. Duncan, Tex.Civ App., 193 S W. 411.

Reasonable time not given

(1) Where pecan trees arrived at station Friday morning, and were damaged by cold during Sunday, and consignee's agent was not notified of arrival until Monday morning, consignee did not have reasonable time time for the removal is definitely fixed by statute,[53] or by the contract between the parties as expressed in the bill of lading.[54] A rule has been laid down that the reasonable time to which the consignee is entitled, for the purpose of taking away the goods after their arrival at their destination, has no reference to the peculiar situation or circumstances of the consignee;[55] that a reasonable time is such time as will enable one residing in the vicinity of the place of delivery, and informed of the usual course of business on the part of the carrier, to come to the place of delivery, inspect the goods, and take them away.[56] This rule, however, has not received universal approval.[57] In determining what is a reasonable time, no consideration is to be given to the distance from the place of delivery at which the consignee lives.[58] The convenience or the accommodation of the consignee, or his means or facilities for removing the goods,[59] or the fact that his inability to remove the goods results from causes that he did not produce and could not avoid,[60] is not to be considered. He cannot defer taking the goods away in order to attend to other matters of his own, no matter how important they may be. The liability of a common carrier for goods in transit is an extraordinary liability and, although founded on sound principles of public policy, is not to be extended beyond the point where necessity for its existence continues.[61]

Whether a question of law or of fact. Where the facts are not in dispute, the question as to whether the time in a particular case was reasonable is ordinarily one of law for the court,[62] and, on the other hand, the question is for the jury when the facts are in dispute, or the inference to be drawn from them is in doubt.[63]

§ 154. Where Goods Are Held at Consignee's Request

Where, following transportation, goods are held by the carrier at the request or with the acquiescence of the consignee, the carrier's liability as such terminates and it becomes liable as a warehouseman only.

Where at the end of the transportation the goods are held by the carrier at the request or with the acquiescence of the consignee, and for his convenience, the liability of the carrier as such is at an end and the extent of its liability is that of warehouseman only.[64] This is so whether the goods are deposited in a warehouse belonging to the carrier in which to remove trees before they were damaged—American Ry. Express Co v. Judd, 104 So. 418, 213 Ala. 242.

(2) Where consignee received notice of arrival of goods shipped, with instructions to hold until advised where to make delivery, after 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and they were damaged by fire the same evening at 9 o'clock, the carrier was still occupying the position of carrier, and not of warehouseman—Bragg v. Terminal service

The retention of an interstate shipment by a carrier as warehouseman under the bill of lading which, in accordance with the published regulations, provides that every service to be performed under it shall be subject to the conditions specified, among which is an express condition governing the carrier's responsibility as warehouseman for property not removed within forty-eight hours after notice of arrival, is a terminal service forming a part of the transportation in the sense of the federal statute, Comp St 1913 § 8563, 49 U.S. C.A. § 1 (4).—Southern Ry Co. v. Prescott, 36 S Ct 469, 240 U.S. 632, 60 L Ed 836, reversing Prescott v. Southern Ry. Co., 83 S E. 781, 99 S. C 422.

or in that of some responsible third person, the carrier having no warehouse at the place of destination.[65]

§ 155. Failure or Refusal of Carrier to Deliver Goods When Called for

A carrier's wrongful refusal or failure to deliver the goods when called for by the consignee extends its extraordinary liability beyond what would be a reasonable time for removal of the goods.

The carrier's liability as insurer is extended beyond what would be a reasonable time, under ordinary circumstances, for the consignee to remove the goods by its wrongful refusal or failure to deliver the goods when called for,[66] unless the loss is shown to have occurred while it was acting as warehouseman.[67] Accordingly, where delivery is prevented by the carrier's failure to have the goods in a position from which the consignee may conveniently remove them,[68] or where, by any similar conduct on the part of the carrier, the consignee is prevented without fault of his own from removing and caring for the goods, the carrier is liable.[69] If the consignee calls for his goods which have arrived and are stored in the depot, but is informed by the carrier's agent, through mistake, that they have not arrived, and the goods are destroyed, the carrier will be liable therefor.[70] Some of these decisions proceed on the theory that the carrier's liability at the time of the destruction of the goods is that of an insurer, while others hold that the negligence of the carrier in wrongfully detaining the goods is the proximate cause of the loss. However, this diversity of views is of no practical importance since the same net result is obtained under either view.[71]

On the other hand, it has been held that where a carrier's failure to deliver freight was not an absolute refusal to deliver, and did not constitute a conversion, the carrier's liability as an insurer was not extended indefinitely.[72] A carrier, required to notify a consignee and deliver on shipper's order, is justified in refusing to deliver until the presentation of such order,[73] but until delivery the carrier is obliged to exercise ordinary care in the preservation of the goods.[74]

§ 156. Liability of Carrier after Expiration of Reasonable Time That of Warehouseman

The liability of a carrier as an insurer is altered, on a lack of diligence by a consignee in removing goods, to that of a warehouseman only.

Notwithstanding the diversity of authority as to what constitutes diligence on the part of a consignee in removing goods, as discussed in § 153 b (2) supra, it is well settled that, where the consignee has not exercised diligence in the removal of the goods, the extraordinary liability of the carrier as an insurer ceases, and he is liable from that time on only as a warehouseman.[75] The Carmack amendment, which provides that until transportation is terminated the liability of the initial carrier continues, does not extend its liability as warehousemen.[76]

Unloading the goods and storage in a warehouse is not requisite to limit a carrier's liability to that of a warehouseman after sufficient notice to consignee,[77] and a movement of the goods to an unloading track after a reasonable time following notice of arrival is not a recognition of a liability other than as warehouseman.[78] However, where a loss has occurred during transportation and the remainder of the goods are not removed within the time allotted, the carrier's liability as to all the goods is not changed to that of a warehouseman.[79]

§ 157. Nature and Extent of Carrier's Liability as Custodian or Warehouseman

A carrier which has become liable for goods as a warehouseman is bound to use ordinary care for their protection, but where by the actions of the consignee it has become a gratuitous bailee, it need exercise only slight care for the protection of the property.

The transportation of goods and the storage of goods are contracts of a different character; and although one person or company may render both services, yet the two contracts are not to be confounded or blended, because the legal liabilities attending the two are different.[80] A person may, in the character of carrier, be liable for a loss from which in the character of warehouseman he would be exempted,[81] since the common law imposes no duty on a common carrier to render services as warehouseman, other than such as are necessarily incidental to the transportation of the property.[82] The liability of a warehouseman is ordinarily different from that of a carrier,[83] as shown in §§ 71–118 supra, the liability of a carrier as such, with some few exceptions, is practically that of an insurer, while the duty of the carrier as warehouseman

Compress company as carrier's agent

Where a railroad, in the absence of a warehouse building to protect cotton at its station, as required by statute, unloaded cotton shipped over its road on the platform of a compress company, the compress company was the agent of the railroad, and not an independent warehouseman.—Wichita Valley Ry. Co. v. Golden, Tex.Civ.App., 211 S.W. 465 is not that of an insurer,[84] but merely to exercise ordinary care, as discussed later in this section.

Gratuitous bailee. The goods may no doubt be so left in the hands of the carrier after reaching their destination and the consignee or owner has had opportunity to take them, as that the further duty of the carrier with reference thereto is only that of an accommodation or gratuitous bailee or custodian, with no right on the part of the carrier to collect charges for keeping, and no duty to exercise more than slight care, and in such case the carrier will be liable, it is said, only for gross negligence.[85] There are decisions, however, which hold that the carrier cannot claim that it was merely a gratuitous bailee before giving notice that it will not insist on the payment of storage charges and will not longer retain possession of the property as a warehouseman.[86]

Bailee for hire. Ordinarily, even after the strict responsibility of carrier ceases, it continues to be a warehouseman of the goods until they are taken by the consignee or owner, and for compensation, either included in the original charge for carriage or collectable as an additional charge against the consignee or owner;[87] and this is so although the goods may not have been unloaded and deposited in a building used for storing freight technically termed a warehouse.[88] Therefore, in accordance with the general principles relating to warehousemen, as discussed in the C.J.S. title Warehousemen and Safe Depositaries § 30, also 67 C.J. p 495 notes 86–91, the carrier as warehouseman is bound to use ordinary care in the keeping of the goods, and will be liable for negligence causing injury or loss thereto,[89] or permitting such goods to injure others.[90] This, however, is the extent of its liability,[91]

Lack of facilities

The fact that a carrier had no depot or warehouse at the place of destination within which to store the goods does not relieve its liability for permitting them to remain in a leaky car, although it had the right to warehouse the goods in a car, which in the exercise of ordinary care was a safe and suitable place.—Hines v. and, of course, no liability results from losses due to an act of God.[92] A much lighter degree of responsibility rests on the carrier, after the function of carriage is deemed by the law to have been completed, and its relation to the property and the owner thereof has assumed the character of that of mere custodian.[93] The carrier is then liable only for such losses or injuries as are shown to have resulted from the want of ordinary care on its part—such care as men of reasonable prudence ordinarily exercise for the safety of their own goods under such circumstances.[94] It is impracticable to differentiate all the various cases as to what acts or omissions on the part of the carrier or its servant or agent will constitute negligence in the preservation or care of the goods in its hands as warehouseman, for this must as a rule depend on the circumstances of each case.[95]

Care required of express companies to constitute ordinary care is greater than that required of ordinary railroad carriers on account of the greater value of the goods usually sent by express, and acts or omissions which may not be negligent in the latter case may be negligent in the former.[96]

§ 158. Actions against Carrier as Warehouseman

In an action against a carrier as warehouseman, the plaintiff has the burden of proving negligence, although the unexplained failure to produce and deliver the goods is generally sufficient to make out a prima facie case for the plaintiff.

The storage of the goods does not create a new contract, and the action against the carrier for negligence in keeping the goods at their destination may be based on the contract of shipment,[97] unless

Protection required by statute

Where a carrier had established a platform as a place for the reception and delivery of cotton, it was required, under statute, to do whatever was reasonably necessary to protect cotton placed on the platform from fire caused by sparks from passing engines, or from a cotton gin located seventy-five or eighty yards therefrom.—Hartford Fire Ins. Fires

(1) The carrier as warehouseman is not liable for loss or injury caused by fires not due to its negligence.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Leverette, 129 S.E. 292, 34 Ga. App. 304—10 C.J. p. 245 note 88 [d].

(2) On the other hand, where cotton received by carrier under bill of lading, and placed with compress company for preparation for shipment, was burned by fire caused by sparks originating from defective chimney of carrier, in close proximity to compress, the carrier was negligent as warehouseman.—Chas. W. Sheppard Cotton Co. v. New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co., 78 So. 193, 118 Miss. 464

Flood

Where it was highly improbable that water would enter car containing intra-state freight in defendant carrier's yard and in his charge as warehouseman, no negligence can be charged against defendant for failure to remove the goods prior to the day of the loss, when it became apparent that there would be a flood.—Chalmers v. New York Cent. R. Co., 161 N.Y.S. 577, 175 App. Div. 239.

Improper care in warehousing

A carrier of seed potatoes from Wisconsin to New Orleans, where it piled them in a solid mass in an open shed without ventilation between the sacks, in consequence of which they became wet, mouldy, and unfit for seed by the time the consignee was required to accept and remove them, was negligent, a carrier being held to knowledge of the proper method of handling and storing a commodity which it accepts for shipment.—Kuney v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 197 N.W. 708, 183 Wis. 569

Storage in defective car

Even though a bill of lading gives carrier an option of keeping goods in car as warehouseman, if not removed in certain time after notice of arrival at destination, it will be liable for negligently keeping them in a leaky car.—Hines v. First Guaranty State Bank of Aubrey, Tex. Com. App., 243 S.W. 972, affirming, Civ. App., 228 S.W. 668.

Unauthorized reshipment

A carrier's unauthorized reshipment of goods from destination, after consignee's failure to call for them and after its liability to hold them as warehouseman has arisen, is wrongful, and imposes absolute liability for their loss in the unauthorized transit.—Belknap v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 91 S.E. 656, 79 W.Va. 691, L.R.A. 1917D 916

No new contract of warehousing independent of contract of carriage was created by a letter from the carrier to interstate shipper, where goods have been stored for nearly two months at an intermediate point.—Western Transit Co. v. A. C. Leslie & Co., 37 S.Ct. 133, 242 U.S. 448, 61 L.Ed. 423, reversing A. C. Leslie & Co. v. Western Transit Co., 150 N.Y.S. 1073, 165 App. Div. 947.

a new contract was intended by the parties.[98] As the action against the carrier as warehouseman is founded on negligence, the burden of proving negligence is on plaintiff,[99] and also of showing that such negligence was the proximate cause of the loss or injury.[1] As in the case of other bailments, as discussed in § 50 c of the C.J.S. title Bailments, the unexplained failure to produce and to deliver the goods is generally sufficient to make out a prima facie case for plaintiff.[2] The custody of the goods being shown to have been in the carrier, and their loss or the failure to produce them being established, the burden of showing that there was no negligence, or at least of explaining the loss in a manner not prima facie negligent, is usually held to rest on the carrier.[3] This burden, it has been said,

Burden of going forward

Where carrier, who arrived at pier too late to deliver plaintiffs' goods to steamship company, proved that he stored goods overnight in warehouse, in which they were destroyed by fire, burden was on plaintiffs to show loss was caused by truckman's negligence, and, in absence of such proof, complaint against truckman, who had no control over warehouse, and who was blameless as to fire, should have been dismissed—Feld v Slaven, 210 N.Y S. 525, 125 Misc 253

Express company

Negligence of express company as warehouseman must be proved—Sheehan v. American Ry. Express Co, 91 Pa.Super 71

Goods stolen

The fact that goods were stolen does not create a prima facie presumption of negligence, and, in the absence of proof, a court will not assume that such theft was due to the carrier's negligence, acting as a warehouseman—Marsh v. Pennsylvania R Co, 167 S E. 274, 159 Va 694.

Interstate shipments

In the case of interstate shipments, the burden of proof of negligence is on plaintiff, and an instruction to the contrary is erroneous—Ft. Smith & W R Co v. Syracuse Portrait Co, 245 P. 600, 117 Okl 113.

What law governs

The measure of an interstate carrier's liability as warehouseman under a bill of lading issued pursuant to federal act as amended, was governed by the provisions of the bill of lading and not by a local law fixing the burden of proof in case of loss by fire—Southern Ry. Co. v. Prescott, 36 S Ct 469, 240 U S. 632, 60 L. Ed. 836, reversing Prescott v Southern Ry. Co, 83 S E. 781, 99 S C 422

Allegation of particulars

The fact that the complaint in an action against a warehouseman for loss of goods stated the particulars of the negligence relied on did not prevent the presumption of negligence, and the warehouseman had the burden of showing due care.—Prescott v Southern Ry. Co., 83 S E. 781, 99 S.C. 422, reversed on other grounds Southern Ry. Co. v. Prescott, 36 S Ct. 469, 240 U.S. 632, 60 L Ed 836

Injury is not conclusive evidence of negligence

Where a railway is in possession of a carload of vegetables as bailee, the freezing of such vegetables is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of its negligence, and can be rebutted by evidence that consignee had access to car and was removing vegetables at time of freezing.—Lynch v. Union Pac R. Co, 172 P. 1061, 65 Colo. 152

Onus of exoneration

In action against a carrier as a warehouseman for damage to goods, instruction that plaintiff had burden of proving defendant negligent, but that when it had shown that goods were in good condition when they were delivered for shipment and when they arrived at destination "then the burden of proof is placed upon the defendant to show that the beans were not damaged because of any want of care on its part," was not erroneous, notwithstanding use of words "burden of proof" instead of more technically correct words is not merely the burden of going forward with the evidence, nor a shifting burden, but a burden of establishing before the jury the absence of negligence.[4] The presumption of negligence raised by a proof of failure to deliver goods on demand is not rebutted by mere proof that the goods cannot be found without any affirmative explanation of their disappearance.[5]

In an action of this character, the usual rules as to admissibility,[6] and weight and sufficiency,[7] of evidence apply. Ordinarily the question of negligence is for the jury,[8] under proper instructions,[9] but where there is no dispute as to the facts, the question of whether the goods have been properly cared for may become one of law.[10]

Where a carrier is held liable as a warehouseman or bailee at the point of shipment, the value of the goods at such place furnishes the proper basis for estimating damages for injury to the goods.[11] In the absence of evidence that such fee is reasonable, it is improper to allow an attorney's fee to the party seeking recovery from a carrier acting as warehouseman.[12]

N. FINAL DELIVERY

§ 159. In General

A delivery of freight may be made in accordance with local or special customs where they are not in contravention of law, and are known to the party whose rights are affected thereby.

In the absence of any provision to the contrary, a local or special custom regulating the delivery of freight by a carrier forms a part of the contract of shipment, if not in contravention of established rules of law;[13] but a usage between the carrier and shipper as to the mode of delivery, contrary to the terms of the contract, will not affect the rights of

In an action for loss of goods stolen from a carrier acting as warehouseman, the absence of previous robberies cannot be shown.—Armstrong Rubber Co. v. Erie R. Co, 137 A. 596, 103 N.J Law 579.

Contradictory statements
Evidence offered by plaintiff, that goods delivered by a carrier to a warehouse was for the purpose of preserving the carrier's lien for freight, is properly excluded when such evidence contradicts plaintiff's previous testimony that storage was in compliance with provisions of the bill of lading.—Mays v. Missouri & N. A. Ry. Co, 271 S.W. 977, 168 Ark. 908.

Presence of watchman
In action against railroad for destruction of car of hay by fire in open yard, testimony of witness, who stated he was in yard nearly every day, as to whether he ever saw or knew of watchman being in yard, was admissible in rebuttal of railroad's proof it maintained watchman.—Champlin v. Erie R. Co., 103 A. 807, 91 N J Law 319.

Surrounding conditions
On the question of negligence in storing goods in an unsafe place, evidence is admissible which shows the condition of surrounding buildings and that smoking in the locality had been prohibited by ordinance.—Judd v. New York, etc., SS. Co., C.C.Pa., 130 F. 991.

Usual care
On the question of care, evidence that the care used about the keeping of the freight was such as carriers exercised with similar freight is competent, but not controlling, evidence on the question of due care—Lane v. § 160. Duty of Carrier to Make

a. In general
b. Sufficiency of delivery
c. Actions for failure to perform contract to deliver

a. In General

After property transported has reached its destination, the carrier has the duty to deliver it to the consignee according to instructions, and the consignee has the reciprocal duty to accept delivery.

It is the duty of a common carrier to make safe delivery of the property intrusted to it for transportation.[15] The consignee has the reciprocal duty to accept the goods;[16] but he is not bound to receive them before they arrive at their destination.[17] In the absence of a special contract or custom,[18] the duty of the carrier is not completed on the mere arrival of the property at its destination, but there must be a final delivery,[19] or offer to deliver,[20] in accordance with the bill of lading or shipping directions,[21] unless there is a sufficient excuse for failure to deliver,[22] as where delivery of live stock is prevented by the quarantine laws;[23] but it has been held that where delivery of goods was prevented by quarantine, the shipper's receipt of the purchase money from the consignee and the delivery of the bills of lading to such consignee, and the subsequent repayment of the money and repossession of the bills of lading by the shipper, did not relieve the carrier of its liability to him for failure to deliver.[24] If an adverse claimant of the goods

Unlawful conditions
Where carrier, sued for delay in delivery of a return shipment, had the bill of lading issued on the return shipment to itself, and would not surrender it to plaintiff shipper so that he could demand and receive his goods on return unless he submitted to conditions it had no right to impose, it cannot complain that he did not get the goods when they arrived at destination, nor object that he was allowed damages because of its own conduct in withholding the bill of lading and depriving him of the possession and use of the goods.—Harrill v. claims no rights under the contract of shipment, and makes no claim until after the goods have arrived at their destination, the carrier owes to him only the duty of a bailee or warehouseman, and may relieve itself from liability by showing that, without fault or negligence on its part, it is unable to deliver the goods.[25] Where goods cannot be delivered as directed, the carrier is charged with the duty to use reasonable efforts to protect the owner from loss,[26] and as soon as the owner has credible evidence that the contract of shipment cannot be carried out, it is his duty to relieve the carrier from further responsibility by giving new directions as to the disposition of the goods.[27] Where a contract for the shipment of live stock provided that the shipper should care for the stock and unload it, and should save the carrier harmless except as to damages resulting from the carrier's negligence, it was the duty of the carrier, if the shipper was not at the destination to unload the stock, to use, at least, ordinary care to preserve the stock from injury until the shipper could be notified; and if ordinary care required the stock to be unloaded, the carrier's failure to do so constituted negligence.[28] A carrier is not estopped to deny delivery because its agent mailed to the shipper a post card on a printed form stating that the goods were delivered, where subsequent communications between the shipper and the consignee negatived a delivery.[29] The act of the carrier in refusing to deliver without lawful excuse not only constitutes a breach of contract,[30] but it also constitutes a conversion, as appears infra § 181.

b. Sufficiency of Delivery

To constitute a delivery to the consignee, he must be placed in actual or constructive possession of the property.

Delivery by the carrier may be shown in a variety of ways, and may be either actual or symbolical, depending on the character of the property and the facts of the particular case,[31] although originally,

Delivery of live stock

Where live stock is shipped to a commission company, there must be an actual delivery by the carrier to complete the contract of carriage, which means that the carrier must put the shipment in the actual physical possession and control of the consignee, or in a place where he has access to it, with no one to interfere with or prevent such control. —Carr v. Acts constituting delivery

(1) Where an interstate shipment of flour was made under order notify bill of lading, and the notify party presented the bill of lading, indorsed in blank by plaintiff to whom it was issued, the notify party made disposition of the flour, and the carrier complied with such disposition, under federal Uniform Bills of Lading Act §§ 8, 9, U S.Comp St. §§ 8604dd, 8604e, which binds the carrier to deliver to the notify party on presentation of bills of lading properly indorsed, it constituted a delivery, and the carrier's duty ceased.—Northern Milling Co v. Davis, 190 N.W. 351, 178 Wis 493.

(2) In such case the fact that the shipment was turned over to a public warehouse at the buyer's orders, and carrier retained warehouse receipts to secure freight charges, and the fact that the notify party afterward refused to receive the shipment did not affect the question of delivery, which was then complete.—Northern Milling Co. v. Davis, supra.

Constructive delivery of two shipments of cotton, under billing "for compression in transit," is made possible and of practical effect by making the compress receipt the indicia of ownership, and causing it to be delivered to the owner or consignee of the shipment by and through the carrier on surrender of the original bill of lading.—St. Louis & S. F. Ry. Co v. Royal Ins. Co, 227 P. 410, 100 Okl. 11.

Acts not constituting delivery

(1) Where a car, on arrival at destination, was placed on a public delivery track and notice given a consignee, who accepted the car, broke the seals, and started to unload, there was no delivery of property still in the car, but only a right of access given to it, in order that it might be removed.—Michigan Cent. R Co v. Mark Owen & Co, 41 S Ct 554, 256 U S 427, 65 L Ed 1032, affirming Mark Owen & Co. v Michigan Cent R. Co., 125 N.E. 767, 291 Ill 149

(2) Spotting car at point for delivery does not amount to delivery.—Estherville Produce Co. v. Chicago, R I & P. R Co., C C A Iowa, 57 F. 2d 50.

(3) Rails shipped, which remained in car on spur track belonging to railroad company and afterward were at common law, actual delivery was required.[32] If something remains to be done to complete delivery and acceptance, the carrier is still liable, at least as warehouseman[33] Thus, until the goods are so separated that the consignee can obtain possession thereof, the carrier's liability continues.[34] So, while delivery of cars of goods may be made by placing the cars on a siding or convenient place for unloading at destination, and by the carrier's surrender of dominion over the goods to the consignee,[35] yet, where the consignee, before he is entitled to possession, is required to pay a draft attached to a bill of lading, the placing of the cars on the consignee's private switch, without intent to surrender control of the goods, and without payment of the draft, does not constitute a delivery.[36] Ordinarily, there is a sufficient delivery where possession of the property is turned over to the consignee, or a tender made and a reasonable opportunity afforded him to remove it,[37] but the tender must be made under conditions enabling the consignee to take possession.[38] The mere arrival of the goods at destination without notice of their arrival to the person entitled thereto is not a delivery;[39] but where the consignee has assumed full dominion and control over the goods, the delivery is complete.[40] There is a sufficient performance of the carrier's duty to deliver, where, after search, it fails to find some person authorized to receive the goods after their arrival.[41] So, where the goods have reached their destination and the consignee or his agent gives a receipt for the same, there is a final delivery,[42] and it makes no difference that a part of the goods are temporarily left on the carrier's premises.[43] The unloaded on right of way, were not delivered to consignee contrary to bill of lading—Morley Cypress Co v. Hines, 107 So. 487, 160 La. 676

(4) Mere arrival of goods at destination without consignee surrendering bill of lading and without carrier recognizing consignee's title or agreeing to hold goods as agent for new purchaser does not constitute possession by buyer.—M. Degaro Co v. Cleveland, C., C & St L Ry. Co., 174 N.E 587, 123 Ohio St. 179.

(5) Delivery of goods by a transfer company at the consignee's back porch, without giving him actual notice, is not a sufficient delivery to relieve the company from liability for loss of the goods.—Hart & Thornton Sausage Co. v. City Transfer Co., 3 Tenn App 175.

Inability of consignee to obtain goods

Where carrier delivered cotton to compress company, as arranged by consignee holding shipper's bill of lading with draft attached, and retained that company's tickets instead of delivering them to consignee, as was usual at that place, so that consignee could not secure the cotton, there was no delivery thereof within Rev.L.1910 § 821, providing that a carrier must deliver the property at the place to which it is addressed in the manner usual at that place.—Wichita Falls & N. Under U.S.Comp.St. § 8563, subd 2, 49 U S.C A § 1, declaring, "The term 'transportation' shall include . . all services in connection with the receipt delivery," etc, "of property transported," "delivery" connotes either tender to the consignee or a reasonable opportunity afforded him for the removal of the property transported—Cork v. Lehigh Valley R. Co, 119 A. 88, 198 N. J.Law 143.

Tender constitutes delivery as a matter of law where consignee did not refuse to accept goods or deny that he was consignee, but merely directed that delivery be made to another—Finck Cigar Factory v. American Ry. Express Co, Tex.Civ. App., 283 S.W. 219.

Reasonable opportunity must be afforded consignee to call, examine, and take his things from carrier's premises, notwithstanding carrier's inability to give notice of arrival of shipment—Brown v. Railway Express Agency, 188 A. 716, 134 Me. 477.

fact that a stockyards company, to which the carrier delivered live stock at the destination, kept the stock in unloading chutes, which were kept locked, rendering it necessary for the consignee to obtain possession of the keys before securing possession of the stock, did not show an incomplete delivery:[44] but, under a contract of shipment forbidding delivery to a prospective purchaser without surrender of the bill of lading, the act of the carrier, after the car had reached its destination, in switching it to an unloading sidetrack, without requiring surrender of the bill of lading, did not constitute a delivery to the purchaser.[45] Since the consignee has a right to inspect the property before accepting delivery, as appears infra § 170, permission given to him or his representative to make such inspection does not constitute a delivery.[46] Where a bill of lading to the order of the consignor was delivered to the buyer in order that he might exercise his right of inspection, a mistake of the carrier's agent in marking the bill of lading as canceled by delivery, did not entitle the consignor to treat the goods as delivered[47]

Agreement as to method of delivery. Where a cotton company shipped cotton to itself as consignee, a compress company, acting as its general agent to receive all cotton so shipped, had authority to agree with the carrier as to the method of receiving cotton when delivered after business hours.[48]

c. Actions for Failure to Perform Contract to Deliver

(1) In general
(2) Damages

(1) In General

In actions against carriers for breach of contract to deliver, the usual rules as to venue, parties, pleading, evidence, and instructions are applicable.

An action for breach of a contract to deliver goods at a specified destination may be brought in the county where the contract was made,[49] or where the failure to deliver occurred.[50] The general rules are applicable in an action against a carrier for failure to perform its contract to deliver, with respect to parties,[51] pleadings,[52] presumptions

Order bill of lading with draft attached

Where apples sold by sample were shipped under an order bill of lading with draft attached, together with directions to notify the purchaser, that the carrier permitted the purchaser to enter the car and inspect the contents without taking up the draft and presenting the bill of lading, was not a delivery of the shipment, inspection without presenting bill having been made by the purchaser according to custom and the bill of lading impliedly authorizing inspection.—Hines v. Stone & Co. v. New York Cent. R. Co., 214 Ill.App. 483.

Complaint or affidavit held sufficient

(1) A complaint, alleging that plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract by the terms of which defendant agreed for a valuable consideration to transport a trunk to Aberdeen and there deliver it to plaintiff or consignee, that defendant failed and refused to make delivery, and that in consequence plaintiff suffered damages, was sufficient to sustain an action for damages for breach of contract.—Grover v. Hines, 213 P. 250, 66 Mont. 230.

(2) Affidavit of cause of action in assumpsit against railroad was held not insufficient for insufficient allegation of defendant's possession of property.—Bank of Philadelphia & Trust Co. v. Wabash Ry. Co., 156 A. 604, 102 Pa.Super. 208.

Specifying property involved

In action against carrier for failure to deliver goods to consignee, plea that "certain articles" shipped were not included in published tariffs and stipulation in bill of lading and that special agreement for their carriage was not made was held insufficient where it did not specify property involved in issue tendered.—Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Herring, 174 So. 502, 234 Ala. 238.

Insufficient affidavit of defense

Plaintiffs declared for value of goods intrusted to carrier for interstate transportation pursuant to its uniform express receipt governing interstate shipments. On tender of delivery the consignee rejected the shipment. Defendant then notified plaintiffs of the rejection, specified charges due, and demanded disposition. Plaintiffs immediately paid the amount, and gave shipping instructions with which defendant avers it was unable to comply because it had then delivered the shipment, on the consignee's order, to the consignee's trustee in bankruptcy. It was held the affidavit of defense was insufficient: first, In the attempted denial that the goods were received and burden of proof,[53] the admissibility[54] and | weight and sufficiency[55] of the evidence, questions for transportation pursuant to the contract alleged, second, in not averring performance of the contract averred; or third, in not justifying the delivery alleged to have been made—J. Caps & Sons v. American Ry. Express Co., 80 Pa Super 244.

Interstate transportation; reference to acts of congress not required

Where plaintiff's statement shows contract sued on is transaction in interstate commerce, special reference to acts of congress governing such shipments is unnecessary.—Tentzer v. Reading Co., 101 Pa.Super. 238.

Pleading stoppage in transitu as defense

In an action by a consignee against a carrier for nondelivery of goods, a defense of stoppage in transitu is sufficiently pleaded where the fact of the stoppage and the obtaining of the goods by the consignor in a method provided by statute is set out.—Pennsylvania Co. v. Bonchek & Gordon, 15 Ohio App. 1.

Issues, proof, and variance

(1) Petition charging that carrier failed to deliver part of shipment of hogs is not sustained by proof that plaintiff's shipment had become interchanged with smaller shipment, which was sold as his.—Carr v. St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co., Mo. App., 284 S.W. 184.

(2) In an action for nondelivery a plea that defendant never received the goods is an admission of nondelivery, and this fact need not be proved to entitle plaintiff to judgment.—Hot Springs R. Co. v. Hudgins, 42 Ark. 485.

(3) A carrier, when sued for failure to deliver goods, may, to relieve itself of the breach set up in the complaint and denied by the general issue, prove, without a special plea, an attempted delivery.—Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Montmollen, 39 So. 820, 145 Ala. 468, 117 Am.S.R. 58.

Presumption as to contents of package delivered to carrier for shipment cannot be indulged in action for nondelivery, in absence of any proof.—Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Seward, 142 So. 881, 106 Fla. 75, reversing 136 So. 620.

Burden of proof

(1) Plaintiff suing express company for failure to deliver merchandise must prove carrier's receipt of merchandise and nondelivery.—Wiesen & Co. v. American Ry. Express Co., 90 Pa.Super. 78.

(2) Plaintiff shipper has burden of proving that defendant carrier's failure to deliver a horse was not excused by liability exceptions in contract of carriage.—Rosenberg v. New York Cent. R. Co., 167 N.Y.S. 518, 180 App.Div. 79.

Shifting burden of proof

The burden is on plaintiff to prove nondelivery of the goods, and where defendant set up no affirmative defense, but merely offered evidence of delivery to plaintiff's authorized agent, introduction of some evidence of nondelivery did not shift burden of proof to defendant.—Nollman v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 131 N.E. 195, 238 Mass. 465.

N.D.—Morrell v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 179 N.W. 922, 46 N.D. 535

Evidence admissible

(1) In action against carrier for nondelivery of lime, brought by one claiming assignment to it by consignor while lime was in transit, assignment of invoice, although conveying no title to plaintiff, was admissible as circumstance for consideration in determining whether title was transferred.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. B. F. Roden Grocery Co., 96 So. 912, 209 Ala. 694.

(2) Carrier sued for not delivering freight shipped under straight bill of lading could show that diversion to different destination as directed by consignor was justified, where consignor was owner and not plaintiff suing for nondelivery.—Stefani v. Southern Pac. Co., 5 P.2d 946, 119 Cal.App. 69.

(3) Defendant denying allegations that he was common carrier could show by truck driver's testimony that loss of goods was not due to his negligence.—American Tobacco Co. v. Schulenburg, Mo.App., 17 S.W.2d 557.

(4) In a shipper's action for non delivery of live stock shipped from Killdeer, N.D., to Chicago, where the testimony concerning the cattle at Killdeer was shown to have been based on a knowledge of the Chicago market, it was not error to admit testimony of the value at Killdeer, although the measure of damages are properly measured by the value at Chicago.—Morrell v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 179 N.W. 922, 46 N.D. 535.

Evidence inadmissible

(1) Admission of evidence of carrier's contract to deliver berries at destination within specified time, which was void for failure to publish and file schedule with interstate commerce commission, was error as furnishing standard by which to measure reasonable time for delivery, on which right to recover was based by court's instructions.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Warren County Strawberry Growers' Ass'n, 267 S.W. 551, 206 Ky. 482.

(2) In suit by a shipper against a carrier for failure to deliver a shipment, where a contract of shipment between the shipper and the carrier provided that suit for failure to deliver must be brought within two years after a reasonable time for delivery, admitting in evidence a letter from the carrier to the shipper written after the shipper's time to sue had expired, stating that the carrier had retired from business, and that it could not consider claims for loss in shipment, except in case of certain C. O. D. shipments, was error, since the letter was not material to the issues and did not establish a waiver by defendant of the provision that plaintiff must sue in two years, as alleged by plaintiff.—Jennings v. Barrett, 194 N.Y.S. 679.

(3) To warrant finding regarding amount of coal delivered to carrier.—Nield v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 225 N.W. 654, 55 S.D. 229.

(4) To justify a finding that defendant's agent was correctly instructed as to the name of the consignee, and that all elements necessary for a binding verbal contract existed.—Montgomery v. Davis, 240 S.W. 282, 209 Mo.App. 698.

(5) To present a prima facie case of nondelivery.—Grover v. Hines, 213 P. 250, 66 Mont. 230.

(6) To support finding that delivery was not made as directed in reconsignment order.—Tenizer v. Reading Co., 101 Pa.Super. 238.

(7) In assumpsit for failure to deliver goods consigned to a common carrier, although the action was based on a bill of lading showing the number of the car in which the shipment was alleged to have been made, it is not essential that plaintiff prove conclusively that the goods were loaded in that particular car. The car number in the bill of lading is not such a material term of the contract that failure to prove shipment in the car will prevent a recovery.—Irwin v. Davis, 82 Pa.Super. 288

Evidence insufficient

(1) To sustain a judgment for defendant.—Epstein v. American Ry. Express Co., 185 N.Y.S. 94.

(2) To prove nondelivery to consignee.—Wiesen & Co. v. American Ry. Express Co., 90 Pa.Super. 78.

(3) To support carrier's defense that shortage of coal shipments was due to evaporation.—Smith v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 209 N.W. 465, 202 Iowa 292.

Negligence of carrier

Evidence held sufficient to show nondelivery of goods was due to carrier's negligence.—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co. v. Allison, 250 S.W. 24, 158 Ark. 209.—Yazoo & M.V.R. Co. v. Altman, 196 S.W. 122, 129 Ark. 358

Value of goods

Evidence held sufficient to support trial court's finding of value.—Stefani v. Southern Pac. Co., 5 P.2d 946, 119 Cal.App. 69.

Custom as to delivery

Proof that consignee received notice from carrier of arrival of freight at destination was held insufficient to establish custom as to delivery.—Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Leverette, 129 S.E. 292, 34 Ga.App. 304.

Delivery to, and acceptance of, goods by carrier

(1) In assumpsit for failure to deliver goods consigned to a common carrier, the case is for the jury, and a verdict for plaintiff will be sustained, where evidence was produced, although contradicted, that the property was delivered to defendant and accepted by it.—Irwin v. Davis, 82 Pa.Super. 288.

(2) Whether the amount of aluminum scrap stated in a bill of lading to have been delivered to a carrier was in fact delivered to it was held for the jury.—Sonken-Galamba Iron & Metal Co. v. Hines, Mo.App., 238 S.W. 135.

Reasonable time for delivery

Ordinarily, the question of a reasonable time for delivery is one of fact for the determination of the jury, in which there enters the consideration of distance, route, mode of conveyance, character of freight, facilities available, usual time required, abnormal conditions of weather, and extraordinary conditions of any character affecting movements of freight.—Spartan Mills v. Davis, 119 S.E. 905, 126 S.C. 312.

Intention as to passing of title to goods

In an action by the seller for failure of carrier to deliver shipment of lumber to purchaser, where the undisputed evidence showed that title was not to pass until delivery to purchaser, the court properly refused to submit to the jury an issue as to the intention of the parties as to the passing of title.—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co. v. Allison, 250 S.W. 24, 158 Ark. 209.

Negligence of carrier

(1) Where one of two cars of lumber shipped by plaintiff to the same consignee was not delivered by the carrier and never reached the address specified in the bills of lading while the other was delivered within three weeks, the evidence made the carrier's negligence for nondelivery of the one car a question for the jury.—St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co. v. Allison, 250 S.W. 24, 158 Ark. 209.

(2) In action against carrier for nondelivery of goods, evidence having tendency to show that incorrect destination was defendant's fault, or that agent knew of destination intended, was held sufficient to take case to jury.—James v. Alabama Great Southern R. Co., 81 So. 582, 202 Ala. 640.

Value of goods

In action for failure to deliver consignment of deer tongue, the value of the consignment is peculiarly a question for the jury.—Hines v. Mizell, 105 S.E. 736, 26 Ga.App. 151.

N.D.—Morrell v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 179 N.W. 922, 46 N.D. 535.

Where the action is for nondelivery, there should be an allegation of demand;[58] but if breach of contract is alleged demand is immaterial.[59] An allegation that plaintiff had not paid or tendered the freight charges is not necessary.[60] On the other hand, it has been held that if the foundation of the action is refusal of the carrier to deliver at the end of the transportation, there should be an averment of payment or tender of freight charges in order to discharge the carrier's lien.[61] There can be no recovery against a carrier for failure to deliver goods, in the absence of evidence that they were in fact delivered to the carrier,[62] and it is not sufficient to show delivery of a box purporting to contain the goods.[63] In Illinois, prior to the enactment of the Uniform Bill of Lading Act, a carrier which had issued a bill of lading acknowledging the receipt of certain goods for transportation could defend in an action for failure to deliver, by showing that, as a matter of fact, no goods had been received by it, but under § 23 of that act, the carrier is deprived of that defense;[64] and in an action by the consignee, who had failed to receive all of the goods purporting to have been shipped under a bill of lading, it is not necessary for plaintiff to allege that the bill purchased by him was issued by the carrier without actually receiving the goods.[65]

One who has paid drafts accompanying a bill of lading for the value of the goods not delivered to the carrier, on the theory that the carrier is estopped to deny having received the goods, must prove in an action for damages for nondelivery that the bill of lading was actually delivered by the carrier or by its authority.[66] Evidence by plaintiff that a shipment had not been delivered to the address specified in the bill of lading raised the presumption that the loss of the shipment was due to the negligence of the carrier or its agents,[67] and the burden was then on the carrier to show the contrary.[68] So, where plaintiff shipper proved delivery of live stock to defendant carrier and nondelivery to the consignee, and also delivery of inferior stock, a presumption of negligence arose, which, being unrebutted, entitled plaintiff to recover.[69] Since, to prove nondelivery is to prove a negative, slight evidence thereof is sufficient to cast on the carrier the burden of accounting for the goods.[70] Evidence of a custom of defendant carrier is inadmissible to contradict the express or implied terms of the contract of shipment.[71] Where the shipper refused to accept cattle at the destination because the carrier rightly refused to deliver the cattle at a dipping vat, and the carrier sold the cattle at public auction, and its tender of a check for the proceeds was refused by the shipper, it was held that, in an action by the shipper to recover the value of the cattle, in which such relief was denied, plaintiff was entitled to have the check delivered to him for collection.[72]

Questions of practice arising in actions of trover against carriers for failure to deliver are treated infra § 183.

Instruction not misleading

Instruction referring to "goods in controversy" was not misleading in action for nondelivery, where goods were designated by case bearing specific number.—Louisiana & N. W. R. Co. v. J. P. Machen & Co., 294 S.W. 714, 174 Ark. 122.

Effect of receipted freight bill

Instruction that receipted freight bill was only prima facie evidence of delivery and that it was the province of the jury, notwithstanding such receipted bill, to determine whether the goods were actually delivered, was not error in action against carrier for nondelivery.—Louisiana & N. W. R. Co. v. J. P. Machen & Co., 294 S.W. 714, 174 Ark. 122.

Goods taken from carrier by attachment

In an action against a carrier for failure to deliver goods, refusal of an instruction that the carrier was not liable for failure to deliver if the goods were taken under attachment was error.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. McKie, Tex.Civ.App., 191 S.W. 576.

(2) Damages

A carrier's liability for nondelivery of a shipment is ordinarily the market value of the goods at the time and place delivery should have been made. Consequential and special damages are recoverable under some circumstances.

Ordinarily, the measure of damages for breach of contract to deliver is the value of the shipment[73] at the point of destination at the time delivery should have been made,[74] less transportation charges.[75] The value recoverable by plaintiff is the market value of the goods at the place of destination, rather than the price at the point of shipment;[76] but it has been held that, where the shipper is a coal dealer at the place of destination, and purchased his coal at the point of shipment for resale at destination, he may waive the difference and reduce his damages to the value at the point of shipment.[77] Where a carrier notified the consignee that the goods had arrived and would shortly be delivered, but the goods were never delivered, the carrier was liable for the loss occurring between the time of notice of arrival and the time the consignee was notified that the goods were lost, or at least for a reasonable time after the notification of arrival.[78] Consequential or special damages not within the contemplation of the parties, and not the proximate and material consequences of the carrier's breach of contract, are not recoverable;[79] but plaintiff may recover any damages which the carrier might reasonably have contemplated would result from its failure to deliver.[80] Special damages for nondelivery are not recoverable unless the shipper gives notice thereof at the time of delivery to the carrier,[81] and the general knowledge of the carrier that the consignee was in the retail coal business would not justify an award of special damages in such an amount as the coal could have been sold for at retail.[82] Where plaintiff shipped the head of a dog which had bitten him, to ascertain whether or not the dog had hydrophobia, the box being marked "Dog's Head, Rush," and defendant was informed of the accident and purpose for which the head was being shipped, defendant was liable, in case of nondelivery for the expense of shipment, mental pain to plaintiff, the expense incurred for medical treatment to prevent hydrophobia, the pain caused by that treatment, and the damage sustained by loss of time while taking it, although the treatment proved to be unnecessary.[83] If the goods had a market price at destination at the time they should have been delivered, the shipper cannot recover special damages for breach of contract to deliver;[84] but it has been held that an action to recover the

Refusal to accept delivery

Where cotton transported to the point of destination was properly tendered ten days later to the holder of the shipper's order bill of lading, a subsequent loss in the market value was attributable to his unwarranted refusal to accept it, not to the carrier's failure promptly to deliver it, and hence was not recoverable from the carrier.—Gulf, C. & S.F. loss resulting from the diminished output of plaintiff's mill, and the expense of hiring an extra man, because of the carrier's failure to deliver machinery after giving notice of its arrival, is an action for direct tangible damages, not for loss of profits.[85] So, it has been held that a shipper of grain, required to submit to a reduction in the selling price because the milling in transit privilege was lost because of the carrier's misrouting of the shipment, may recover for such loss;[86] but such damages cannot be recovered where the milling in transit privilege was available only when reference thereto was noted on the shipping order and bill of lading, and no such notation was made.[87] Where the goods are offered back to the shipper, the measure of damages for nondelivery of the goods is the difference between the market value at the time and place of delivery, and when they were offered back, irrespective of the cause of the reduction in such value.[88] The expense incurred by the owner of the goods in making a trip to the place of destination to recover them is not recoverable in an action for breach of the carrier's contract to deliver.[89] It has been held, however, that, where live stock was wrongfully delivered to a third party, the owner was entitled to recover a sum which he was required to pay such third party for feeding the stock before he could recover possession thereof.[90] It is the duty of a consignee seeking to recover damages for nondelivery to make reasonable efforts to minimize the loss.[91] Damages recoverable for delay in delivery are discussed infra § 162; damages for misdelivery in actions based on breach of contract are discussed infra § 174 d; and damages in actions for conversion, based on misdelivery, are discussed infra § 184.

§ 161. What Must Be Delivered

a. In general
b. Part delivery

a. In General

The carrier must, as a general rule, deliver to the consignee the identical goods shipped to him. Where the goods of two shippers become so commingled as to render separation impossible, each shipper may recover the value of his shipment in case of a loss for which the carrier is liable.

Ordinarily the carrier is bound to deliver to the consignee the identical goods shipped to him, and it is liable for any damage sustained by him in consequence of a delivery of other goods, whether caused by admixture or otherwise.[92] Where the goods of one shipper become mixed indiscriminately with those of another in such a way that separation is impossible, as where shipments of grain are mixed in one mass, the respective owners of the shipments become tenants in common of the entire mass, and each may recover the value of his shipment in the case of a loss for which the carrier is responsible.[93]

b. Part Delivery

There may be a delivery and acceptance as to a part of the goods, except where the part not delivered is necessary to make the whole consignment effective, or where it does not appear that the goods tendered were in fact a part of the original consignment.

There may, of course, be delivery and acceptance as to a part of the goods, leaving the carrier liable as to the balance,[94] and, as a general rule, failure of the carrier to tender all the goods shipped will not justify the consignee in refusing to receive the part of the goods tendered.[95] Where a carrier issues a bill of lading covering a shipment, and fails to establish the nonreceipt of any part thereof, it is liable for failure to deliver the whole shipment.[96] So, where the carrier fails to deliver a part of a consignment and the part not delivered is necessary to make the whole consignment effective, this amounts to a failure to deliver the whole, and the consignee is not bound to accept it,[97] nor is the consignee bound to accept partial delivery, where it does not appear that the goods so tendered were in fact a part of the original consignment.[98] Where

Refusal to accept part delivery held justified

Where a party delivered to a railroad company, at Joliet, one thou-freight consists of separate articles, there may be a partial delivery,[99] but when carload freight is placed on a delivery track, and a drayman is permitted to open it and begin unloading, there is a delivery of the whole carload.[1]

§ 162. Time of Delivery

Delivery to the consignee must be made within a reasonable time after completion of transportation and during business hours.

Delivery must be made within a reasonable time after the actual transportation to the point of destination is completed; otherwise the carrier is guilty of a breach of contract for which damages are recoverable,[2] if the delay was the proximate cause of the damage,[3] unless there was a sufficient excuse for the delay;[4] and a like rule has been applied where the carrier transports perishable goods ahead of schedule, but unreasonably refuses to deliver until the scheduled time.[5] So, delivery or tender to the consignee must be made at a reasonable hour,[6] and during business hours.[7] What is a reasonable time for making delivery is ordinarily a question of fact.[8]

In construing a statute providing that cars for unloading shall be considered placed "when" they are held awaiting orders from the consignors or consignees, it was held that the word "when" meant "while", and that the duty of prompt delivery is not ended when cars are placed on a "hold track" to await orders, but that the time allowed for delivery is merely suspended while the cars are so held.[9]

Where the contract provided for delivery of a car on the consignee's private siding, but, such siding being occupied, it was agreed that delivery should be made on a public siding, the carrier was not bound to place the car on the public siding immediately on learning, after its arrival, that the private siding was occupied.[10]

Weather conditions. The consignee is not obliged to accept, during sub-zero weather, delivery of vegetables susceptable of freezing, and on his refusal to accept them, it is the duty of the carrier to protect them until delivery can be made without injury from freezing.[11]

Mistake in address. Where goods shipped by express were wrongly addressed, it was the duty of the express company to discover the mistake, make inquiry, ascertain the consignee's correct address, and make delivery within a reasonable time thereafter.[12]

Money consigned to bank. It has been held that the proper time for a carrier to deliver money consigned to a bank is not limited to banking hours, in the absence of a special contract and usage of the place to that effect, but that an offer to deliver at any time during the usual hours of business, with due regard to the safety and convenience of the consignee, is sufficient.[13]

Damages. Where property is not delivered at the proper time, plaintiff may recover for the loss due to the decline in the market during the wrongful detention.[14]

Questions involving delay in the transportation of goods to their destination, not involving delivery to the consignee after the goods have arrived at such place, are discussed infra §§ 190–194.

§ 163. Place of Delivery

Ordinarily, a railroad carrier cannot be compelled to deliver freight to a point off its lines.

It is a general rule that, in the absence of constitutional or statutory provisions, a carrier by railroad cannot be compelled to deliver freight to a point off its lines.[15] The duty of a carrier to deliver the property transported by it at the specified destination, or at the usual place for delivery, or at a suitable place to receive the property, including the right to deliver on private tracks, and the effect of acceptance of delivery at a place other than that specified in the contract of shipment, is treated infra §§ 164–168. The liability of the carrier for making delivery at the wrong place is treated infra § 176.

§ 164. Duty to Deliver at Destination Specified in General

It is the duty of the carrier to deliver the property at the place designated in the contract of shipment, or according to authorized directions changing the place of delivery.

It is the duty of the carrier to deliver the freight at the destination designated in the contract of shipment, and delivery at any other place, whether in close proximity to the place designated or not, will not relieve the carrier from its responsibility as such,[16] although it has been held otherwise where

Where destination of live stock is stockyards, the arrival of train carrying shipment in the switching yards of the carrier three or four miles from the stockyards is not a delivery completing the shipment.—Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Gross, Tex.Civ.App., 204 S.W. 693.

Delivery of live stock to wrong stockyards

Where a carrier had knowledge that the shipper was the owner of the deviation from the designated place is too slight to prejudice the consignor.[17] If the carrier's line does not reach the destination named, its duty is to take the goods as near to the place of destination as practicable, in accordance with its general custom and usage, and to notify the consignee at the place of destination.[18] The shipper's instructions to the carrier to advise the consignee of a shipment to a particular destination, does not require delivery at a particular station at such destination.[19] A temporary congestion in the classification yards of a railroad terminal, or the temporary necessity of shifting cars there, does not excuse an absolute refusal to deliver at the particular place in the terminal designated in the bill of lading.[20]

Delivery at nonagency station. Where a bill of lading provided that property destined to a station at which no regular appointed agent was located should be at risk of owner after unloading from the cars, a carrier unloading a shipment at a nonagency station, which the shipper knew was such, without anyone present to receive the goods, did not become liable for their loss.[21]

Superseding instructions; diversion of shipment. The shipper may dictate where freight shall be delivered;[22] and a direction to deliver at a certain place may be superseded by a subsequent direction, so as to require delivery according to the later direction,[23] unless the subsequent direction is given by one not authorized to give it.[24] Where the consignor of goods shipped under a straight bill of lading is named therein as consignee, a diversion of the shipment in transit, at the request of a prospective buyer in whose care the goods are consigned, is not a delivery to such buyer.[25]

§ 165. Delivery on Private Tracks

By contract or custom a carrier may be required to deliver property on a private siding or spur track, but otherwise it is under no such duty.

In the absence of contract or custom, the carrier is under no common-law duty to deliver freight on private sidings or spur tracks of the consignee,[26] and the fact that it does so voluntarily does not ren-

Wabash Ry. Co., 231 S.W. 649, 207 Mo. App. 161.

Construction of shipping contract

Where cattle shipped from Kentucky were consigned to "C., R. & Co., Chicago, Illinois, care of G. & E., Cincinnati, Ohio," independent firms of cattle brokers in the separate cities, Cincinnati being on the route of the shipment, it was the duty of the railroad to deliver the shipment to the Cincinnati firm at such city.—Cincinnati, N. der such service enforceable as a right;[27] in fact it may be in direct conflict with statutes prohibiting rebates, as discussed infra § 379. Receiving and delivering freight on spur tracks of private individuals is purely a matter of contract to which either party may attach any condition desired.[28] It has been held that the fact that it has been the custom and practice of the carrier to place consignments billed for private spur tracks on such tracks will not prevent the carrier from changing its manner of delivering consignments by making delivery on a switch instead of on the private spur, provided notice of such action is given to the consignee; such notice, however, is necessary.[29] Where a carrier, pursuant to custom, places a car on a private siding, it relinquishes all dominion over the shipment, and the delivery is complete.[30] Where, by contract or custom, delivery is to be made at an industrial plant having an elaborate intra-mural system of trackage, delivery is complete when the cars containing the consignment are hauled from the carrier's main line to the general storage track of the consignee within the limits of the latter's yard, and the carrier is not bound to distribute the cars along such intra-mural trackage system to the various mills and warehouses of the consignee.[31] Under an ordinary contract of open shipment providing for unconditional delivery at a private sidetrack of the consignee, delivery is complete when the goods are placed on such sidetrack;[32] but where the goods, although routed to a private siding, are shipped under an order notify bill of lading, and neither the contract nor the prevailing custom authorizes delivery on a private siding, the placing of the goods thereon is not a delivery, but is merely a tender of delivery on compliance by the order notify consignee with the terms of the shipping contract, and the consignee need not accept the tender.[33]

§ 166. Acceptance at Place Other than Destination Specified

Acceptance by the person entitled to the goods at a place other than their specified destination will relieve the carrier from further liability.

While the owner of the goods is under no circumstances required to receive them before arrival at destination, as stated supra § 160 a, he may accept them at any place before or after arrival at destination, and this acceptance will work a discharge of the carrier from further liability;[34] but the acceptance of delivery at an intermediate point will not relieve the carrier from liability for damages already incurred,[35] and an offer to receive at an intermediate point on conditions which are refused will not terminate the carrier's liability nor its duty to deliver at the original destination.[36] The

(2) The obligation of a common carrier with respect to the delivery and receipt of carload freight at private sidings and industrial tracks is restricted to acceptance and delivery at a point on the siding a sufficient distance from the point of connection with the tracks of the carrier to clear such tracks, and does not extend to placing or spotting cars at such points on an industrial railroad as the shipper designates.—Norfolk Tidewater Terminals v Norfolk & P. Belt Line R Co, supra

(3) Accordingly, a carrier operating a switching line had the duty to place cars intended for delivery at marine terminal at a point where they could be conveniently taken over by the terminal company, but services rendered beyond such placement were gratuitous.—Norfolk Tidewater Terminals v. place of delivery may always be varied with the assent of the owner of the property,[37] and if he interferes to control or direct in the matter, he assumes the responsibility.[38] So, it has been held that, where a consignee, on being notified of the arrival of goods at a place other than the destination contracted for, directs the goods to be forwarded to another place and receives them, this acceptance amounts to a waiver of the carrier's liability for an erroneous delivery.[39]

§ 167. Duty to Deliver at Usual Place at Destination for Making Delivery

a. In general
b. Effect of special contract
c. Delivery of grain in bulk; statutory provisions

a. In General

It is the duty of the carrier, in the absence of express stipulations to the contrary, to deliver the property at the usual place for making delivery at the point of destination, which, ordinarily, is a station, freight depot, or warehouse.

The place where property is to be delivered by a carrier is at the usual place for making such delivery at the point of destination,[40] unless, as may be done, a specified place is expressly stipulated for in the contract of shipment, as brought out infra § 167 b, or unless delivery at the usual place, such as the carrier's freight depot, is waived.[41] So, under a contract calling for delivery of cattle at the usual place, with a pencil notation by the carrier's agent regarding dipping and reshipping, the carrier is not required to deliver the cattle to a dipping vat or to any other place than that specified in the contract; and aside from this, the carrier could not be required to deliver the cattle to a dipping vat which had been closed to the public under proceedings to abate a nuisance.[42] Where the carrier has completed the contract of shipment, it is not bound to deliver the loaded cars containing the goods shipped to another carrier in the city of destination to be transported by its line across the city in the absence of any custom requiring it.[43] Ordinarily, the usual place is the station, freight depot, or warehouse where goods are customarily unloaded and delivered,[44] or, in case of heavy freight, such as lumber, stone, etc., team tracks or some convenient place on the carrier's grounds,[45] team track delivery being defined as "a service rendered by carriers in receiving and delivering carload freight in connection with their own line business, and is over the tracks owned by the carriers";[46] but a carrier may lawfully stipulate, either expressly or by implication, that its responsibility shall end when it has placed the goods on a sidetrack at the point of destination, where the carrier maintains neither agent, depot, nor warehouse at that point.[47] The foregoing rule is based on the theory that a delivery of this character is the only delivery which it is within the power of the carrier to make.[48] A fortiori is the carrier relieved of further responsibility by a delivery of this character where the consignee was present when the car was placed on the sidetrack and assumed control of the goods, and removed part of them, failing then to remove the balance, subsequently burned in the car, merely from

There is an implied contract for such delivery where the fact that there is no agent, station, or warehouse at the point of destination is known to the consignee.—Massee & Felton Lumber Co. v. Southern Ry. Co., 149 S.E. 427, 40 Ga.App. 326.

lack of conveyances.[49] The carrier may change the place of delivery from a platform which had been the usual place of delivery for twenty years, to another accessible platform.[50]

b. Effect of Special Contract

By special agreement the carrier may be bound to deliver at a particular place although it is not the usual place for delivery.

If goods are accepted for delivery at a specified warehouse, or other particular place, the carrier is bound to deliver at such place, although it is not the ordinary place for delivery at that destination.[51]

c. Delivery of Grain in Bulk; Statutory Provisions

Under some statutes a railroad carrier is prohibited from delivering grain in bulk to any warehouse other than that to which it has been consigned, without the consent of the owner or consignee.

Under a statute expressly prohibiting railroad companies from making delivery of grain in bulk which they may have received for transportation into any warehouse other than that to which it is consigned except when the owner's or the consignee's assent has been obtained, it is the duty of a railroad carrier, when so directed, to deliver grain to a private warehouse of the consignee located on a sidetrack constructed by the consignee, and leading to the main track of the railroad.[52] Such a statute applies only to shipments of grain,[53] and is limited to cases where grain is shipped in bulk,[54] and to cases where the warehouse or the elevator to which the grain is consigned is not located near the carrier's tracks nor near tracks over which it has a right of way.[55] The statute has no application to cases in which the grain was not originally consigned to a particular elevator at the time of shipping. A mere demand by the consignee at the place of destination that the grain be delivered at a particular warehouse is not enough to render the company subject to the penalties of the statute.[56]

§ 168. Duty to Deliver at Suitable Place for Receipt of Goods by Consignee

It is the duty of the carrier, when the property has reached the proper destination, to deliver it at a safe and accessible place for the consignee to receive it.

In addition to the duty already mentioned to deliver at the destination specified in the contract of shipment and at no other place, it is the further duty of the carrier, when the goods have reached their proper destination, to deliver them at a place safe and reasonable for the consignee to receive them.[57] Ordinarily it is a question for the jury under the circumstances of each particular case to determine, under proper instructions from the court, what would be a reasonable place for delivery.[58] However, if the consignee accepts a delivery of the shipment at a place or in a manner different from what the law would require of the carrier, he thereby waives his right to demand delivery at a different place or in a different manner, and cannot hold the carrier liable for losses occurring in the course of a removal from such place of delivery, although they might not have occurred had a proper delivery been made.[59]

Delivery of live stock. Where live stock is to be delivered from a car, the carrier must place the car where it may conveniently be unloaded by the consignee.[60] Such obligation is nondelegable, and, where delivery cannot be made in the pens of the consignee, the duty of the carrier is not performed by delivery at the chutes of a stockyards company, which placed them in inaccessible pens.[61] A disregard by the carrier of the shipper's directions not to unload live stock in public pens at the point of destination constitutes negligence.[62]

§ 169. Storage

The carrier cannot abandon the goods for failure of the consignee to appear and claim them; it must store or warehouse them, as will appear infra § 179.

§ 170. Opportunity to Inspect

The consignee, whether of an intra-state or interstate shipment, has a right to inspect the property before acceptance in the absence of any provision in the shipping contract to the contrary.

The consignee ordinarily has the right to examine the goods before accepting delivery,[63] and this doctrine applies to interstate as well as intra-state shipments, there being nothing in the Carmack amendment which restricts this right.[64] If unloading is essential for that purpose, the duty rests on the carrier to unload,[65] but it has been held that a notation on a bill of lading, "allow inspection," meant a side door inspection, that is, that the consignee had a right to examine the contents of a car by opening the side door, and that it gave him no authority to unload the car.[66] A stipulation in a bill of lading that inspection will not be permitted "unless provided by law, or unless permission is indorsed on this original bill of lading, or given in writing by the shipper," being inserted to comply with the Carmack amendment, which, however, contains no prohibition of inspection at destination, does not limit the right of inspection by a prospective buyer of goods shipped under a uniform order

Placing cars on sidetrack

The common-law liability of a carrier for the delivery of a shipment of animals does not terminate when the cars containing the animals are placed on a sidetrack at the point of destination, but continues until the cars are placed in a position where the animals can be unloaded.—Erisman v. Wabash Ry. Co., Mo. App., 243 S.W. 237.

Place of inspection

Where seller authorized railroad to allow buyer to inspect goods without advance payment of draft and delivery of bill of lading, without stipulating in what particular place and manner the inspection should be made, the railroad did not violate instructions by placing the car containing the goods on the privately owned track of buyer adjacent to buyer's warehouse for the purpose of enabling buyer properly to inspect goods.—Pittman-Harrison Co. v. Delay caused by holiday

When a railroad common carrier establishes rules allowing twenty four hours, for final inspection and acceptance by consignee, on shipment of eggs, the carrier cannot take advantage of a delay beyond such period, caused by the fact that the carrier was observing holidays, and the consignee had no access to the goods, it having appeared that the consignee exercised due diligence and completed his inspection within twenty four hours, exclusive of the holidays and Sunday which intervened.—Marcus Bros. v. bill of lading;[67] and, moreover, such a stipulation in the bill, being inserted for the carrier's benefit, may be waived by it.[68] Where the bill of lading prohibits inspection of the shipment without the written permission of the shipper, the carrier may properly allow inspection if the shipper sends out circular letters stating that inspection will be allowed,[69] and, where a consignee examines goods while they are in the car, without permission, the carrier is not liable if it was not negligent.[70] So, where the shipping contract forbids inspection before delivery of the bill of lading, the carrier is not liable for an inspection by the prospective buyer, made secretly, without its knowledge or consent.[71] The lawful holder of the bill of lading has a right to inspect the consignment at a sidetrack designated in the bill of lading and cannot be required to make the inspection on another sidetrack which, by the rules of the railroad known to such holder, has been set aside for inspection.[72] However, the delivery of cars of goods at the proper place for inspection by the consignee releases the carrier from liability as a common carrier, unless the consignee, on inspection, rejects the freight and notifies the carrier to that effect.[73] The fact that the carrier permits or fails to prevent an unauthorized inspection of goods which does not injure them does not amount to a conversion, although the consignor refuses to accept them.[74]

The right of a consignee of goods carried C. O. D. to examine them is treated infra § 186.

§ 171. Personal Delivery

a. In general

b. Railroad and special transportation companies

c. Express companies

a. In General

At common law, before the introduction of railroads, a common carrier by land was compelled to make delivery to the consignee in person, either at his residence or place of business, but the rule was later relaxed.

At common law and before the introduction of railroad carriers a common carrier by land was compelled to make delivery to the consignee in person, either at his residence or place of business, and the delivery elsewhere would not operate to discharge the carrier from liability, unless a special contract or usage to the contrary could be shown;[75] but the common law later relaxed the earlier rule requiring personal delivery by the carrier, as the character and the quantity of freight changed.[76]

b. Railroad and Special Transportation Companies

A railroad carrier ordinarily is not bound to make personal delivery unless required by special contract, and the same principle applies to special transportation companies.

In the absence of special contract requiring it,[77] a railroad carrier is under no duty to make personal delivery,[78] but is bound only to carry the goods to the depot or station to which they are destined, and there to put them in a warehouse or other place of safety and to hold them ready for delivery when called for.[79] The same principle is applicable to special transportation companies;[80] but, although the common-law rule requiring an actual delivery to the consignee was relaxed in the case of railroad companies, owing to their inability arising out of their methods of transportation to make such delivery, the reason for the relaxation ceases when the consignee's place of business to which the goods are directed adjoins the company's tracks, and the courts have returned to the original rule and exacted an actual delivery in such cases.[81]

c. Express Companies

An express company must deliver the property to the consignee at his residence or place of business, unless such delivery is waived by the consignee, or circumstances exist which show a contrary intention of the parties.

Ordinarily an express company is not only required, as a common carrier, to transport the goods to the place of destination, but the further duty is also enjoined on it to deliver the goods to the consignee at his residence or place of business.[82] Until reasonable effort to deliver in person has been made, the express company remains liable as carrier;[83] but a delivery in accordance with the rule stated may be waived by the consignee, as where there is an offer to make delivery which is declined by the consignee in order to serve his own convenience.[84] The contract of carriage may be modified essentially by express agreement or by circumstances from which an intention of the parties can be clearly gathered to change the usual incidents of the contract so as to put an end to the responsibility of the express company as soon as the goods are transported by it to a particular terminus,[85] and it has been held that, even in cities, delivery districts may be established, beyond the limits of which deliveries need not be made.[86] Delivery of an express shipment at the consignee's correct address to the person in charge does not amount to a misdelivery, although a different address was marked on the package.[87] As stated in § 162 supra, delivery should be made during business hours, but, in the case of money consigned to a bank, not necessarily during banking hours.

Custom and usage will sometimes relieve an express company from the duty of actual delivery at the residence or place of business of the consignee, as discussed in the C.J.S. title Customs and Usages § 19, also 17 C.J. p 481 note 42.

"Freight" and "express" shipments distinguished

There is a well recognized distinction between the liability of a carrier in handling so-called express and freight shipments, having as its most important feature the manner in which the carrier is bound to make delivery. "Freight shipments," as the term is commonly used, means those distinct from baggage, to go by railroad carriers, and not by express carriers whose duty it is to deliver the goods to the consignee personally.—Baum v. (1) General Rule

A carrier must deliver the freight to the designated consignee; and delivery to the consignee under a straight bill of lading, without any power of disposal reserved to the consignor, completes the contract of shipment even though the bill of lading is not produced.

A consignee is that person or corporation to whom a carrier may lawfully make delivery of consigned goods in accordance with its contract of carriage.[91] The goods must be delivered to the designated consignee, and to him only, where there is nothing to indicate that he is not entitled to receive them;[92] and if there is a mistake in the consignee's

As owner or bailee

It has been held that such deliveree, or consignee, "may or may not be the owner, he may be a mere bailee, gratuitous or otherwise, a vendee, a commission merchant, or a mere agent of the shipper; and he may even be a swindler, who had deceived the shipper or consignor into sending him goods to which he can assert no legal or equitable title or interest whatever. In determining who is a consignee the question is not in the first instance to ascertain the contractual relations or lack of them between the person shipping the goods and the person entitled to receive them, but to correctly interpret the contract of carriage made by the shipper with the carrier."—U. Delivery to person other than consignee is a breach of contract of carriage.—Koscherak Siphon Bottle Works v. North & East River S. S. Co., 239 N.Y.S. 351, 135 Misc. 635.

Excuse for nondelivery to consignee

(1) Instructions given express company at time of shipment to hold delivery of the shipment until advised where to make delivery related merely to the time and place of delivery and did not relieve it of the ultimate duty of delivering the goods to the consignee.—Bragg v. Taylor, 199 N.Y.S. 156, 205 App.Div. 59, affirmed 142 N.E. 327, 236 N.Y. 666.

(2) Where, under Uniform Bill of Lading Act, U.S.Comp.St. §§ 8604aaaa and 8604cc, 49 U.S.C.A. §§ 82, 86, nonnegotiable express receipt constituted straight bill of lading, owner of receipt was entitled to delivery of goods under U.S.Comp.St. §§ 8604e and 8604ee, 49 U.S.C.A. §§ 89, 90.—Wall v. American Ry. Express Co., 272 S.W. 76, 220 Mo.App. 989

(3) Where consignor sold a machine under title retention contract, but after delivery to carrier, to be shipped to purchaser under straight bill of lading, demanded that carrier divert shipment to another, carrier had a "lawful excuse," within Bill of Lading Act § 8, U.S.Comp.St. § 8604dd, 49 U.S.C.A. § 88, for refusal to deliver machine to original consignee.—Patterson v. American Ry. Express Co., 123 S.E. 844, 129 S.C. 237.

Shipper's request for change in destination does not include a change of the consignee.—Davis v. Fruita name, it is the duty of the carrier to make reasonable inquiry from the consignor in an effort to correct it.[93] A carrier may, however, rightfully deliver the goods to a person to whom the consignee has directed delivery to be made.[94] Where a carrier receives goods for delivery under a "straight" or nonnegotiable bill of lading for delivery to a person named, without any reservation of power of disposal by the consignor, a delivery to such person,[95] or to his authorized agent, see infra § 172 d, completes the contract and relieves the carrier from any further liability. This rests on the assumption which the carrier is authorized to entertain that the title to the goods passes to the consignee on delivery to the carrier,[96] an assumption which is strengthened by a recital in the bill of lading that ownership of the goods is in the consignee;[97] and in the absence of some special statute otherwise providing,[98] if there is nothing in the bill of lading or shipping receipt indicating a reservation of title or power of disposal in the consignor, it is not necessary that the consignee, in a straight bill of lading, produce the bill in order to be entitled to receive the goods, or that the carrier should require its production and surrender in order to be protected fully in making the delivery to such consignee,[99] since the consignor could have protected himself against an improper delivery by using an or-

Reconsignment; delivery to second consignee

Where a carrier, on being notified of the original consignee's refusal to pay for the goods shipped, indorsed on the original bill of lading a statement that they were reconsigned to another, a new contract of shipment came into existence, under which the carrier must make delivery to the second consignee, although the original consignee did not consent to the reconsignment.—A E Myers & Co. v Norfolk Southern R Co., 88 S.E. 149, 171 N.C. 190.

Effect of issuance of two bills of lading

If the carrier issues a bill of lading to the consignor for the delivery of the goods to such consignor, and then without authority issues another bill to the consignee, it will be liable to the consignee who has advanced money on such bill of lading for failure to deliver in accordance with such second bill.—Chicago, etc, R. Consignee doing business under trade name

Actual delivery of goods, at address to which consigned to person doing business under trade name of consignee, is a good delivery, although receipt is signed by another trade name than that used by shipper in addressing goods, and the carrier is not liable to shipper for misdelivery, where person ordering goods receives them.—Southeastern Express Co v. Kimball, 101 So. 563, 136 Miss. 420.

Under the Uniform Bill of Lading Act, 49 U S.C.A. §§ 82, 83, defining a "straight" bill of lading as one in which it is stated that the goods are consigned or destined to a specified person, and an "order" bill of lading as one in which it is stated that the goods are consigned or destined to the order of any person named in such bill, and under § 86, providing that a straight bill of lading shall state on its face that it is not negotiable, an interstate carrier is justified in delivering the freight to the consignee named in a straight bill of lading.—Atlantic Coast Line R. der bill of lading,[1] or by giving the carrier notice that the consignee was not entitled to receive delivery;[2] nor will reservation of power of disposal to the consignor in the bill of lading render delivery to the consignee unlawful if the carrier has no notice of the existence of such bill of lading.[3] Where goods are shipped under a straight bill of lading to the consignor, who wrote a letter to one who had purchased the goods, directing him to "take care of this car on arrival," such letter was a sufficient delivery order to justify the carrier in delivering the goods to the buyer, although the bill of lading was not presented, nor draft attached thereto paid.[4]

(2) Exceptions to, and Qualifications of, Rule

Where the carrier has notice that the consignee is not entitled to receive delivery, a delivery to him is unauthorized. If the title to the goods or the power of disposal is reserved by the issuance of a bill of lading negotiable in form, or by an express provision that surrender of the bill, properly indorsed, shall be required before delivery, or otherwise, delivery to the consignee without production and surrender of the bill, properly indorsed, is unauthorized.

The presumption that the consignee is the owner is not absolute, but may be rebutted.[5] Where the carrier has notice from the true owner or one entitled to possession of the property, that the consignee is not the owner or entitled to receive the property transported, delivery to him is unauthorized,[6] and constitutes conversion, as appears infra § 174. No particular form of notice is necessary. If the carrier has notice that title or power of disposal is reserved, either by issuance of a bill of lading negotiable in form,[7] or by an express provision in the Delivery before payment

Where goods were consigned by a straight bill of lading in care of the bank for the alleged consignee, plaintiff having failed to guard himself against delivery before payment by using an order bill of lading, or notifying the carrier that the goods should not be delivered except on payment, defendant is not bound to know the arrangements between consignor and consignee.—Mayer v. Southern Pac. Co., 159 N Y S. 93, 95 Misc. 498.

Bill of lading transferred to third person

Consignor of interstate shipment could protect himself against delivery to consignee, without surrender of the bill of lading, by taking order bill of lading, as provided by interstate commerce commission, or, if taking a straight bill of lading thereunder, by notification to carrier, under Personal Property Law § 219, as added by L 1911 c 248, that a third person was transferee of the bill—Dusal Chemical Co. v Southern Pac Co., 168 N Y.S 617, 102 Misc. 222.

Facts putting on inquiry

That goods were consigned by straight bill of lading to a symbol in care of the bank for the alleged consignee, the symbol did not put the carrier on inquiry as to an arrangement between consignor and consignee, where payment of the purchase price was to be made before delivery.—Mayer v Southern Pac. Statutory provisions

(1) Under the Pomerene Act, U.S. Comp St. § 8604ee, the carrier has no right to deliver to the consignee named in a straight bill of lading, where it has been requested by, or on behalf of, a person having a right of property or possession in the goods, not to make delivery.
U S—In re Taub, C C A N.Y., 7 F 2d 447
Mont.—Grover v. Hines, 213 P. 250, 66 Mont. 230.

(2) Under § 32 of such act, Comp. St § 8604pp, transferor of straight bill of lading or transferee thereof has the right to notify carrier not to make delivery to consignee named in straight bill.—In re Taub, supra.

Duty of carrier as to goods in storage

A carrier, which deposited a shipment of fruit with a storage company as against consignee named in straight bill, pursuant to instructions received from one claiming the right to the shipment, was required, after the fruit had been inspected and checked, and shipping documents examined and freight paid, to advise the storage company to deliver the fruit to the lawful consignee.—In re Taub, C C A N.Y., 7 F 2d 447.

Time to investigate

Where property at destination is demanded by consignee and also by an adverse claimant, the carrier on its request is entitled to a reasonable time for investigation before an action will lie against it—Taylor v. Duluth, S S. & A. Ry. Co., 166 N.W. 128, 139 Minn. 216.

bill of lading that the surrender of the bill, properly indorsed, shall be required before delivery,[8] or otherwise,[9] the carrier is not justified in making delivery except on production and surrender of the bill of lading properly indorsed; and an actual indorsement by the consignee of a forged bill of lading affords the carrier no more protection than would be given by delivery directly to the consignee without the production of any bill of lading.[10] The carrier is bound to observe the directions of the bill of lading which is not controlled by the marks on the goods designating the person to whom they are sent.[11]

c. Holder of Bill of Lading

(1) In general
(2) "Order" bill of lading

(1) In General

Delivery may be made to the indorsee of a bill of lading which is made to stand for the goods; but if the person claiming the goods does not produce and surrender the bill of lading, the carrier makes delivery to him at its peril, unless the requirement for surrender is waived, or the bill of lading gives the carrier the right to make delivery without surrender.

The indorsement of a bill of lading which by reserving in some manner to the person in whose favor it is drawn, whether he is the owner of the goods or the consignee, the right of subsequent disposition is made to stand as representative of the goods, transfers the right to receive the goods named therein, and authorizes and requires delivery to such indorsee,[12] even though he may have secured possession of it wrongfully and may have no right to it;[13] and the duty to deliver to the indorsee is not qualified by directions in a waybill which, by mistake of the carrier's agent, directed delivery to a third person.[14] However, if the bill of lading is made to stand for the goods, the person claiming the goods should produce and surrender the bill of lading. Otherwise, the carrier will make delivery to claimant of the goods at its peril,[15]

Consignee designated as consignor

(1) A carrier is not warranted treating as owners consignees who were named in bill of lading as consignors, and in delivering property without production of bill of lading.—King v. Barbarin, Mich., 249 F. 303, 161 C.C.A. 311.

(2) Where sellers of goods took back their dishonored draft, drawn on consignees who were named in bill of lading as consignors also, they could recover from the carrier which had delivered the shipment without production of original bill of lading.—King v. Barbarin, supra.

Liability to bona fide holder of bill

Carrier, by delivering goods to consignee without production of bill of lading, becomes liable to bona fide holder of bill for value, whether by way of purchase or as security for advances before delivery of goods at destination.—King v. Barbarin, Mich., 249 F. 303, 161 C.C.A. 311.

Provision for delivery "upon presentation of the duplicate hereof" established the fact that the consignors were the owners of the property, so as to render a delivery to the consignee without presentation of any bill of lading unauthorized.—Jeffersonville, etc., R. Co. v. Irvin, 46 Ind. 180.—McEwen v. Jeffersonville, etc., R. Co., 33 Ind. 368, 5 Am. R. 216.

Delivery held unauthorized

Station agent, wiring consignor of shipment consigned to one not at place of destination for advice as to disposition, was not authorized to deliver to person for whom intended rendering it liable for conversion, as appears infra § 174 a; and this is especially true in view of statutes enacted in some jurisdictions prohibiting or regulating delivery without production of the bill of lading.[16] Notwithstanding the rule stated, the requirement that the bill of lading be surrendered before delivery of the goods may be waived by the consignor, and in a contest between the carrier and the consignor the former is fully protected, if it can show the latter's assent to the delivery without surrender of the bill of lading.[17] So, the carrier will be protected by making delivery without requiring the production and surrender of the bill of lading, where the bill provides that it may do so unless the word "order" is written thereon before or after the name of the party to whose order the freight is consigned, and such word does not appear on the bill.[18] If the goods are in fact delivered to the right person, it is immaterial, so far as the consignor is concerned, that a surrender of the bill of lading, in accordance with its terms, was not required; no breach of duty to the consignor is thereby involved;[19] and it has also been held that delivery to the right person, without surrender of the bill of lading in accordance with its terms, imposes no liability on the carrier in favor of one to whom the bill of lading was assigned after delivery of the goods.[20] It has been held, however, that the rule allowing a carrier sued by the holder of a bill of lading for the value of the goods shipped to show, as an excuse for delivery to another without the production of the bill, that the person receiving them was the true owner, is founded on principles of bailment,[21] and that such rule has no application where such person was not the holder or owner of the bill of lading, and had no right to receive the goods without it.[22] Delivery to any person other than the consignee, without an order from him or the indorsement of the bill of lading, is unauthorized.[23] The mere possession of the bill of lading by a person other than the consignee, without indorsement, will not authorize the carrier to deliver the goods to such person.[24]

(2) "Order" Bill of Lading

(a) In general

(b) Effect of "order notify" clause

(a) In General

Freight shipped under an "order" bill of lading may ordinarily be delivered only on production of the bill of lading, properly indorsed.

The term "shipper's order," as used in the bill of lading, is well understood and means that the title remains in the shipper until he orders a delivery of the goods,[25] and that the carrier must not deliver but who was not named as consignee, on receipt of telegram advising that car was for him, without his having surrendered or ever having had possession of bill of lading—Missouri Pac. R Co. v. Toll, 261 S.W. 652, 164 Ark. 327.

Delivery of goods to drawee of sight draft without surrender of the attached bill of lading in which the shipper was named as consignee, is unauthorized—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Johnson, 10 S.W.2d 1104, 226 Ky. 322.

Persons entitled to maintain action

Where the original consignee of goods shipped under an order bill of lading had drawn a draft on a subsequent consignee which he cashed with the bank to which he indorsed the bill of lading, his liability to the bank on the draft after it was dishonored by the drawee does not entitle him to recover from the carrier for delivering the goods to the second consignee without requiring surrender of the bill of lading, and the carrier incurred no liability to him in making the delivery, under U. S Comp St. § 8604r, 49 U.S.C.A. § 115—Davis v First Nat. Bank of Longview, Tex Civ.App., 245 S.W. 1009.

Injury to consignor

except on production of the bill of lading properly indorsed by the shipper.[26] Hence, where the bill of lading provides for delivery to the shipper's order or to his assigns, delivery of the goods to the consignee or anyone else without the bill of lading properly indorsed, is wrongful.[27] Especially are the foregoing rules applicable where the "shipper's order" bill of lading has attached to it a draft on the buyer,[28] or where the bill of lading expressly provides that the goods shall not be delivered without its surrender, properly indorsed;[29] and where delivery is made without complying with such provision, no title to the goods passes to the consignee.[30]

Federal Bills of Lading Act. Interstate shipments are governed by the Federal Bills of Lading Act, 49 U.S.C.A. c 4, under which freight shipped under an order bill of lading should ordinarily not be delivered except on presentation and surrender of the bill,[31] and if the bill has been lost, stolen, or destroyed, the carrier can only deliver on order of court and execution of bond, as shown infra § 172 f. Such Act does not render a delivery without the production and surrender of the bill of lading an illegal delivery; but the carrier takes the risk of such a delivery and will be liable for any loss which the shipper sustains thereby.[32] Delivery to the holder of an order bill of lading, properly indorsed, is justified,[33] regardless of the capacity in which he holds possession of the Fruita Mercantile Co., 220 P. 983, 74 Colo. 247.

Attempted change of order bill into straight bill

"Delivery"

Under Bills of Lading Act § 9, Comp St. § 8604e, providing that delivery is justified to a person in possession of an order bill by the terms of which the goods are deliverable to his order, or which has been indorsed to him, the act of the terminal carrier, after a shipment reached its destination, in striking out the original destination and substituting another, and delivering the shipment to another railroad for transportation to such new destination, on request of the party holding the bill of lading, constituted in legal contemplation a "delivery"—Pere Marquette Ry Co. v. J. F. French & Co., 41 S.Ct. 195, 254 U.S. 538, 65 L.Ed. 391, reversing J. F. French & Co. v.

bill, or whether he holds it lawfully or unlawfully, so long as the carrier has no notice of any infirmity of title.[34] So, delivery may be made to a person to whose order the bill is made, on his production of the bill, or on the production thereof by one to whom the bill has been duly indorsed, or on production of the bill indorsed in blank.[35] A carrier, however, is not justified in delivering a shipment if the order bill is not properly indorsed or if the carrier has information that the person demanding delivery is not lawfully entitled to possession;[36] and where the face of an unindorsed consignor's order bill of lading showed that the shipment was made to the order of the consignor, and was to be delivered to the proposed buyer of the goods only on payment of the attached draft, a delivery to such buyer without payment of the draft was not authorized.[37] Where freight was delivered without the production and surrender of the order bill of lading, which was still held by the shipper, who thereafter transferred it to another, the bill was not spent at the time of the transfer, as its obligation had not been met, and the carrier was liable to the transferee for the wrongful delivery.[38] Notwithstanding the general rule under the statute, that the bill of lading should be surrendered before delivery of the goods, a delivery to the real owner without production and surrender of the bill will protect the carrier, except as against a bona fide purchaser of the bill for value.[39]

(b) Effect of "Order Notify" Clause

Delivery of goods shipped under an "order notify" bill of lading or receipt, to the person to be notified, without production and surrender of the bill or receipt, is unauthorized.

Where a bill of lading or a shipping receipt contains a clause providing that a third person shall be notified of the arrival of the goods, or where it contains this clause and an additional clause reciting that the goods are shipped to the consignor's order, the carrier is not authorized to treat the person to be notified as a consignee, and if it delivers the goods to him without production and surrender of the receipt or the bill of lading, it will be liable to the true owner of the goods for any loss resulting from such delivery,[40] especially where the

The rule that under § 9, of the Federal Bills of Lading Act, Pomerene Act, Comp St. § 8604e, 49 U.S.C A. § 89, physical possession by one of a bill of lading justifies delivery to him by the carrier, applies only where the order bill of lading is properly indorsed, and not to an unindorsed bill of lading to which a draft is attached by a consignor, indicating to the carrier that delivery should be made only on payment of the draft by the prospective buyer who holds physical possession of the bill—Davis v. Carrier violated its duty under a bill of lading shipping "to F. Company, Paris, Texas, notify J.," when it delivered the shipment to J. without an order from F Company, the bill being an "order bill," and negotiable under U S Comp St §§ 8604a to 8604n, 49 U S C.A §§ 20–107—F L Shaw Co. v Coleman, Tex Civ App, 236 S W 178, error refused.

Removal of part of goods

Carrier was negligent in permitting consignee to remove part of shipment from car without production of order bill of lading—Missouri Pac R Co. v. Myers, 293 S W. 15, 173 Ark 747.

Owner of goods as shipper and consignee

(1) Where seller of goods shipped goods consigned to himself and attached bill of lading to draft, notation in bill of lading that buyer should be notified did not authorize the carrier to deliver the shipment to the buyer without the production of the bill of lading.—Louisville & N R Co. v Sarris & Collas, 95 So. 903, 209 Ala. 217.

(2) Carrier issuing bill of lading, naming owner as both shipper and consignee, with direction to notify third person, unless otherwise directed by some holder of bill of lading properly indorsed, must deliver to holder of bill of lading, or one duly authorized by him to receive goods, and cannot deliver to the per-bill of lading expressly requires surrender thereof,[41] properly indorsed,[42] before delivery is made. Delivery of the goods under these circumstances without surrender of the receipt or the bill of lading constitutes a conversion, as appears infra § 174 a. A direction of this character in a shipping receipt or a bill of lading raises no presumption that the person to be notified is the consignee,[43] but on the contrary indicates that the carrier is not entitled to deliver the goods except on production of the bill of lading.[44] The fact that a carrier was instructed to notify a third party of the arrival of goods gives him no right to require a delivery without permission of the shipper,[45] or the production and surrender of the bill of lading, properly indorsed.[46] A carrier of perishable articles, shipped to the shipper's order with instructions to notify the prospective purchaser, had no authority, after giving such notice, and before receiving the bill of lading, to unload them at a point designated by the purchaser, where they were liable to freeze;[47] but a carrier is not entitled to require the production of an order bill of lading until it has complied with the transportation contract;[48] and even then, if it makes delivery without requesting the production of the bill or questioning the right of the notified party to the possession of the property, it is estopped to take advantage of such party's failure to produce the bill.[49] The shipper has no cause of action against the carrier for delivering the goods to the party to be notified, without receiving the bill of lading, where no damage to the shipper results therefrom.[50] Where an order notify bill of lading requires notification to the consignee and production of the bill before delivery, the consignee is entitled to a reasonable time after the arrival of the goods within which to obtain and produce the bill of lading.[51]

son designated to be notified to whom bill of lading has never been assigned or to another acting on his orders.—Southern Ry. Co v Hodgson Bros. Co, 98 S E 541, 148 Ga 851, reversing 95 S.E. 263, 21 Ga.App 753, conformed to 99 S E. 41, 25 Ga App. 536.

Excuse for wrongful delivery held insufficient

Where the receiver of a corporation, which purchased oil of the shipper, who had consigned the same to his own order, with directions to notify a soap company on delivery of the oil, wired the soap company that he was doing all possible to locate documents in order to stop demurrage, and suggested that the soap company establish bond to produce documents and unload the car, such telegram was not authority to the carrier to deliver the oil to the soap company without surrender of the bill of lading, or, in lieu thereof, a bond indemnifying the carrier, and, having done so, the receiver may recover from the carrier.—First Nat. Bank of Chicago v. Rogers, Brown & Co, D C.Wash, 273 F. 529.

Effect of failure to indorse

(1) Where "order notify" bill of lading required surrender of original order bill of lading, properly indorsed, shipper's mistake in sending original bill, instead of memorandum bill, direct to order notify party, unindorsed, did not relieve carrier from requiring it to be properly indorsed before delivery to order notify party.—Southern Ry. d. Agent

(1) In general
(2) Goods addressed to consignee in care of third person

(1) In General

Delivery of the goods to an agent of the consignee authorized to receive them, or whose acceptance thereof is ratified by the consignee, is a good delivery.

A delivery of the goods by the carrier to an agent of the consignee or other person entitled thereto, who has been duly authorized to receive the goods,[52] or whose acceptance of the goods is ratified by the consignee, with knowledge of the facts,[53] is a good delivery, completing the duty of the carrier in reference to the shipment. So, although a seller's delivery of a live stock shipment to the buyer was conditioned on the latter's payment of the price, whereby title remained in the seller, nevertheless, if the buyer was authorized to receive the shipment, delivery to him relieved the carrier from liability, although he failed to pay the price.[54] If the person to whom delivery is made is really the agent authorized to receive the goods, the delivery will be sufficient, although the authority was not known to the carrier,[55] or although the delivery was made on insufficient or even on false evidence.[56] A carrier is justified in delivering goods to the consignor's agent, although he obtained possession of the bills of lading by fraud, intending to appropriate them to his own use, and therefore, in perpetrating a crime, obtained no title to the bills by delivery.[57] An agent engaged in the general employment of the consignee in connection with his business may not have such authority as to excuse the carrier in making delivery to him if he has not actual authority to receive the goods,[58] and delivery to one who had been the consignee's agent, but whose authority had been terminated, with notice to the carrier, is not sufficient.[59] When the carrier is sued for misdelivery, it must show that the agent was authorized to receive the goods, or at least that he had been clothed with such apparent authority as to justify it in presuming his authority;[60] but no greater degree of proof of authority in the person to whom they were delivered is required than for

Delivery to drayman

Where a drayman is authorized by the consignee to receive a shipment, or the carrier by a course of dealing with the consignee has a right to depend on delivery to such drayman, such delivery constitutes a delivery to the consignee.—Payne v. Johnson, Fluker & Co., 108 S.E. 803, 27 Ga.App. 452.

Delegation of agent's authority

Where a truckman was the consignee's agent to receive delivery of express packages, and one of the truckman's drivers receipted for a package, and afterward appropriated it, the agent's employee, in receiving the package, acted within the apparent scope of authority which defendant had delegated to drivers of his trucks, and delivery of the package by the railroad company was good as against both the consignee and the truckman.—Caplan v. Ebel, 73 Pa.Super. 601.

Interstate shipment; effect of federal statutes

Where, on an interstate shipment, straight bills of lading were not marked "nonnegotiable," or "not negotiable," to eradicate negotiability pursuant to U.S.Comp.St. § 8604aaa et seq., and the carrier on their surrender delivered the goods to consignor's agent, who receipted therefor in his own name, Carmack Amendment to Interstate Commerce Act, § 20, U.S.Comp.St. § 8604a, and Act Congr. Aug. 29, 1916, § 29, U.S.Comp.St. § 8604o, 29 U.S.C.A. § 109, must be applied, and hence bills were transferred by delivery to the agent as the statute provides, so that the carrier was justified in the delivery of the goods to the agent.—Swift v. Davis, 193 N.Y.S. 848, 118 Misc. 205.

Receipt, signed by the consignee's agent by his mark, admitting receipt of the goods, is valid, although not attested and acknowledged, and its effect cannot be limited in an action against the carrier for failure to deliver the same goods receipted for.—Louisville & N. any other issue in a civil case.[61] While the mere fact that persons are required, by an order bill of lading, to be notified gives them no rights in, or authority to, receive the goods, as stated supra § 172 c (2) (b), and does not make them agents for that purpose, such agency may be created by a subsequent parol agreement.[62] Where the shipper's contract with the carrier is not a bill of lading, delivery to the consignee's agent is a good delivery without production of the contract.[63] The agent's authority to accept delivery of the goods need not be in writing, unless expressly so required by statute.[64]

(2) Goods Addressed to Consignee in Care of Third Person

Goods addressed to the consignee in care of a third person may properly be delivered to such person in the absence of notice that he is not entitled to receive them. There are conflicting decisions as to whether this rule applies to goods directed to the consignee in care of the carrier's agent.

Where goods are addressed to the consignee in care of a third person, delivery to the latter ordinarily discharges the carrier's obligation, in the absence of any notice to it that such delivery is unauthorized;[65] but if the carrier knows that the authority of the person to whom the goods are so addressed is limited to a specified purpose, it will not be protected in making delivery to him or on his order,[66] and a delivery under such circumstances renders the carrier liable for conversion, as appears infra § 174 a. Although goods consigned to one person in care of another may properly be delivered to the latter, it does not follow that such delivery is the only delivery that will relieve the carrier from liability;[67] and if the person in whose care the goods are consigned declines to accept them, the consignee is the proper person to whom delivery should be made.[68]

Goods sent in care of carrier's local agent. Some authorities have held that where goods are directed to the consignee in care of an agent of the carrier at the point of destination, a delivery to such agent will constitute a complete delivery and exonerate the carrier;[69] but there is authority to the contrary.[70]

e. Real Owner

A carrier must deliver the goods to the real owner on his demand, and will be protected in making such delivery; but the carrier assumes the burden of proving the ownership of the person to whom delivery is made.

A carrier may, and it is its duty to, deliver the goods in its possession to the real owner on his demand therefor,[71] regardless of whether he is con-signor, consignee, or holder of the bill of lading,[72] if the carrier has no notice of any fraud on the part of such owner in obtaining title to the goods,[73] and in doing so the carrier does not render itself liable to one who, having fraudulently or otherwise unlawfully obtained possession of them, has delivered them to the carrier for transportation.[74] This is in accordance with the general principle of the law of bailments, as stated in the C.J.S. title Bailments § 38 a, also 6 C.J. p 1110 note 18, by which the bailee is not answerable to the bailor where the bailee has performed his legal duty by delivering the goods to the true owner—a principle which is especially applicable to common carriers who must carry for all who offer.[75] In order to justify delivery to the true owner contrary to, or without, the shipper's orders, the carrier assumes the burden of proving the ownership of the person to whom delivery was made,[76] although there are decisions to the contrary.[77] There is, however, no rule requiring the carrier to give notice to the bailor of such delivery.[78] It is generally held that the real owner may maintain an action against the carrier for refusal to deliver goods to which he is entitled,[79] and it constitutes no defense that the carrier refused to recognize his title and right and delivered the property in accordance with the shipment.[80] However, to authorize the maintenance of such an action by a third person, he must have intervened before delivery of the goods and demanded them, and have given notice of his right to the property and of his intention to enforce it.[81] As the carrier cannot set up the right of a third person who has made no demand for the goods as an excuse for not delivering them to the person entitled thereto under the contract of shipment,[82] so the carrier may, without liability to the true owner, deliver, pursuant to the contract of shipment, goods received from one not rightfully entitled to possession, if such delivery is made without notice of the rights of the true owner.[83]

f. Indemnity to Carrier

Under some statutes a bond may be given by one to whom the goods are wrongfully delivered, to indemnify the carrier against liability for misdelivery, and the carrier may sue on such bond where he has suffered loss; but in the absence of statute, a carrier cannot, by taking security from a purchaser to whom the goods were wrongfully delivered, compel the shipper to whose order the goods were consigned to look to such purchaser for payment of the price.

Under some statutes, where delivery of the goods in the carrier's possession may not rightfully be made without the production and surrender of the bill of lading, the carrier is, nevertheless, authorized to make delivery without the production of the bill, on receiving security against loss from the person to whom delivery is made.[84] When a bond given by the person to whom delivery is wrongfully made without production of the bill of lading is conditioned on the subsequent production of the bill, it is not enforceable after the carrier retakes possession of the goods.[85] The fact that the carrier would not deliver an interstate shipment to one to whom it was invoiced unless he executed an indemnity bond is a sufficient consideration for the bond;[86] and, where the carrier has responded in damages to the real owner of the property, it may maintain an action on the bond,[87] without tendering back the freight charges paid.[88] Neither the bringing nor the dismissal of an attachment by the person to whom the goods were delivered constituted a tender back of the goods, so as to affect the carrier's right to recover on the bond.[89] In the absence of statute, a carrier cannot, it has been held, relieve itself of liability for delivering goods shipped under an order bill of lading without the production and surrender of the bill, by taking an indemnity bond in lieu of the bill.[90]

84. Federal Bills of Lading Act

(1) Under Federal Bills of Lading Act, 49 USCA § 94, providing in effect that the court may order delivery of goods shipped under an order bill of lading without production and surrender of the bill of lading, on proof of the loss, theft, or destruction of the bill, and on giving the carrier a bond to protect it against loss incurred by reason of the original bill remaining outstanding, such bonds are valid.—Northwestern Casualty & Surety Co. v Illinois Cent. R. Co, CCA Ill., 19 F 2d 868.

(2) The words "lost, stolen, or destroyed" should be broadly construed to include any circumstance whereunder, for the time being, the bill of lading is in effect lost to the owner.—Northwestern Casualty & Surety Co. v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., supra.

(3) Under such Act, in event of loss of order bill of lading, carrier could only deliver interstate shipment on order of court and execution of bond—Orange Nat. Bank v. Southern Pac Co., 110 So. 329, 162 La. 223, 56 A.L.R. 1167.
